Perhaps I had better state another thing. The gentleman from New York seems not to understand what nearly all the States of this Union understand and have declared through their constitutions and their laws, that pooling is an evil; he does not seem to understand that when these railroads were incorporated it was known that they possessed a monopoly of the transportation and travel over their particular lines and the hope of the people for relief from this monopoly grew out of such competition as might be afforded by the water ways and all other means of transportation and by such competition as might be created by the building of new railroads, and if these remedies should fail, by the legislative power using its constitutional and rightful authority to control the action of common carriers. The gentleman does not seem to understand any of these things. But to mitigate the evil of monopolistic power he would make one grand monopoly out of many of these small monopolies and say to them, "Destroy competition, assume the controlling of the commerce and the freights of this country, levy upon it what tribute you please; you have nothing to prevent you from exacting all that the commodity will bear except just enough to leave the people to work for your benefit. Take yourselves the profits which would otherwise go to the laborers of this country; command the commerce of the country; levy tribute on it; no power shall control you; competition shall not control you; legislation shall not control you."

The gentleman from New York does not speak of striking out this section in order to benefit the bill. He would not vote for one section, one sentence, or one line in the bill. His object is to oppose all legislation and every effort to lay the restraints of legal regulations upon the power of these corporations to rob and plunder the people.

Such, Mr. Speaker, I say to you and to the members of this House are the influences that have actuated the advocates of these corporations from the beginning until now and which will continue to actuate them until the subject is disposed of.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a question?

Mr. REAGAN, Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDD. I agree with the gentleman that pools ought to be prohibited, but I ask why in this section he has simply prohibited what are known as money pools, while he allows what are known as physical pools and differential contracts to be established among these corporations? Why, sir, five out of every six pools are physical or territorial pools for the division of the freight as such. This is simply a division of the money profits; it is what is known in railroad parlance as a money pool.

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman from California, but I do not yield to him for a speech.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, is not this debate proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. REAGAN. I will read the provision of this section:

> And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will permit me to go on. It seems I can not read a sentence without some gentlemen rising to interrupt me.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I understand this is a debate under the five-minute rule, and I object to one gentleman occupying the floor by courtesy or otherwise for more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection in this case comes too late. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor in the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. REAGAN. Now I will proceed again if I can be permitted to read this provision:

> And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

The gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] talks about differential rates. I am persuaded from the manner in which he has introduced the subject that he does not know what differential rates are. Those arise from a contest between different cities as to the rates which different cities shall pay. The gentleman talks about the distinction between physical and territorial pooling and some other kind of pooling, I do not know what.

A MEMBER. Money pools.

Mr. REAGAN. My purpose is to provide that competing railroads shall not put their earnings into a common pool, and divide those earnings while denying the people competition—plundering them to the extent of the power of the monopoly and dividing the amount of their earnings among themselves upon a rate agreed upon. But I am persuaded that the gentleman from California, like the gentleman from New York, will never get this bill so amended that he can support any one of its sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. DUNN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. Perhaps it is well for the House to be informed just what this pool, which it is proposed to prohibit, is. Mr. Fink, in his testimony before the committee, told us that the forty or more principal trunk lines of this country——

A MEMBER. Forty-eight.

Mr. DUNN. That the forty or forty-eight principal through or trunk lines of the country were in the pool of which he is the commissioner. Now we know that all the competition which can be expected among railroads is to be expected from what are called through lines or trunk lines. These have established in this country, as they have done in England and Germany, pools. In Germany the traffic is divided among different companies or roads in such a manner that the bulk of it passes over one road during one month and over another road during the succeeding month, and so on. Here the traffic goes at the convenience of the shippers, and the earnings are divided at the arbitrary will of the commissioner of the pool pro rata, or upon a basis agreed upon by the companies or fixed by the pool commissioner among the roads.

Thus competition is destroyed and monopoly crystallized, intrenched, and fortified. If absolute monopoly is inevitable, then we had better begin to consider the policy that has obtained in all countries in Europe except England, namely, of transferring the ownership of all the railroads to the respective States or to the General Government. The theory there is that the government alone can be trusted with a monopoly of railroad transportation, because it will be to the interest of the Government to protect the interest of the people and their commerce and productive industries, and because it will not discriminate or unduly oppress. That argument is better in a representative than in a monarchical government.

But that policy should be only a dernier ressort anywhere.

In this same article which states the nature of these pools in other countries Dr. Ely says that in England, between two towns or cities having already one line, when another was built, instead of the rates being reduced by competition, as should be the case, the roads were pooled and tariffs increased. Instead of competition putting down rates, the operation of the pools has been in all other countries to increase rates. The end of competition is the pool and complete monopoly.

The gentleman from New York complains that we propose to give only five days' notice of a change of schedule. In Prussia the railway traffic is required by law to be made known to the government and published. Changes in the tariff are not allowed to be made without notifying the government and the public. In case the change increases rates it must be published at least six weeks—not five days—before it is to go into effect. That is the law of Prussia. All the old governments of Europe require regular published notice for a designated time of all changes in schedules.

Dr. Ely says that monopoly is the only solution and avoidance of railroad competition; and in all Europe they say monopoly must come to save the roads from competition. The pool makes a monopoly in the hands of the forty-eight trunk lines of this country. There is to be no more competition. The pool settles rates at will. The shippers who should control the great mass of the commerce of this country have no representative in that pool. The people who pay the tribute have no hearing in the pool, no voice in the selection of the commissioners; commerce has none; labor has none; productive industry has none. Nobody has a voice in that commission but the railroad corporations, for whose benefit alone the pool is established.

The gentleman speaks of the voice of New York not having been heard in this matter. It is the heavy hand of New York that is felt to be so oppressive upon the productive labor and commerce and business interests of this country that has made legislation of this character necessary. Let New York remember that and learn to be just. Let her loosen her fatal grip that is now felt to be strangling legitimate business and stifling all prosperity. When the people cry out in their dire distress and humbly petition for relief from injustice the voice of New York responds in the cold, cruel language of the wicked son of Solomon:

> Whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUDD. I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, to be called upon to explain a matter which should be apparent to every one who had studied the pooling question. Had it not been for the remark of the gentleman from Texas, that I did not know what I was talking about when I referred to the money and physical pools, I would not at this time answer his statement. In as civil a manner as a person could I asked him why in the prohibition of pooling he discriminates between moneyed pools and physical pools, and he answers back that I do not know what I am talking about. If he will take any work upon the railroad question he will see that all writers make a distinction between moneyed pools and physical pools. Mr. Nimmo, in his report for 1880, says:

> A railroad freight pool is simply an agreement that at competing points the several contestants for traffic shall be allowed a certain percentage of it, or of the receipts therefrom, to be determined either by arbitration or by a convention of the representatives of all the competing roads.

In his report of 1879 Mr. Nimmo uses this language:

> The pooling arrangements which have been entered into between railroad companies in this country differ from each other in several important particulars. In certain cases the division or apportionment of traffic is based upon the tonnage moved, constituting what is known as a physical pool; but in other cases the receipts from traffic are divided, constituting what is known as a moneyed pool.

In other words, Mr. Nimmo, statistician of the Government, who has studied the question thoroughly, divides pools into two general classes, moneyed and physical. He goes on and gives eight or nine most important pooling arrangements entered into by the trunk lines, and of the seven given by him four are physical and three are moneyed pools. The gentleman from Texas, after long study on this question, desires to prohibit all pooling, and attempts this by prohibiting pooling only where there is a division between companies of the gross or net receipts. The trunk lines in the pools of 1875 and 1876 had, under Fink's management, what were known as physical pools. There are not only moneyed and physical, but many other combinations; there is a division by agreement or combination and division of territory, the railroad that runs through one section not being permitted to take the traffic of another.

Competition is absolutely destroyed by agreements not prohibited here. They often have in physical pooling what are known as "eveners," and under the arrangement which governs them there have been divisions of the amount of traffic which can be carried, the Pennsylvania road being allowed a certain per cent. from New York on to Chicago and the Baltimore and Ohio another per cent., while the Grand Trunk and the Erie and Central roads were allowed still other per cents. of traffic. This was a physical pool, a division of the traffic which often has an instrumentality known as "eveners" for the purpose of carrying it into effect. This is not prohibited; and if pooling is improper and wrong, as I say it generally is, why not extend the operation of this bill? Why is it you prohibit pooling simply in a moneyed sense and not in a physical sense? Why not introduce such amendment as I have drawn up and have here, and which I would like to have an opportunity to submit for the judgment of the House. It is as follows:

> Strike out all after the word "railroads," in line 12, and insert thereafter "or which has for its object the increase or maintenance of rates through a division of freight or territory or by agreement."

Not only do they pool by a division of the proceeds, not only do they pool by a division of freights, but they maintain prices and agree to what rates should be charged from certain points, sometimes taking Chicago as the basis and establishing different rates. I know, sir, what I am talking about on this subject.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUDD. Any question in the world.

Mr. REAGAN. Do you notice that it prohibits all classes of pooling, and does the gentleman suppose that railroads would pool rates when they can not divide the earnings?

Mr. BUDD. They do it.

Mr. REAGAN. When they can not divide the earnings?

Mr. BUDD. They divide freights as such, and not earnings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. DUNN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BUDD. I renew it. I wish to answer the last portion of the gentleman's question. He asked me whether any of the railroads would divide freights if they could not divide earnings. Now I have already referred to Mr. Nimmo, and I might refer further to Adams in his book on the railroad problem. The gentleman from Texas says this freight division is prohibited in this section. I say no, because it prohibits only an agreement for pooling freights by a division of the gross or net proceeds——

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BUDD. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. When it is said that—

> It shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them—

Have you not cut off physical pooling?

Mr. BUDD. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. When it provides that it shall not divide proceeds, does not that cut off physical pooling?

Mr. BUDD. It is not necessary for me to bring in an English grammar to give construction to this language which is so plain. It prohibits pooling of freights by dividing between them the net or aggregate proceeds of the earnings of said companies.

Mr. BRUMM. If you substitute the word "or" for the word "by" would not that answer the purpose?

Mr. BUDD. Yes; that might do it.

Mr. BRUMM. Then why not do it?

Mr. BUDD. Now, the recent pooling by Rinstin at Chicago of the traffic of the Northwestern road was, as I understand the facts, what is known as a money pool. The poolings of Fink in 1875–'76, as spoken of by Adams in his work on the railroad problem, were what is known as physical pools.

Mr. HORR. Is there anything wrong about that?

Mr. BUDD. A commission could better investigate the matter and determine, but if the House insists upon prohibiting all pooling they should use language that will do it. The pooling of the Southwestern Association was a physical pool. They divided the traffic: to the Chicago roads 44½ per cent., to the Saint Louis roads 44½ per cent., and to the Wabash (Toledo) line 11 per cent.

The Chicago-Omaha apportionment was a money pool. The apportionment arrangement between Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Louis, the Chicago and Northwestern, and the Chicago, Saint Paul and Minneapolis Railways was a money pool. The cattle pool, or what is known as the "cattle evener's" pool, which was organized in 1875, was a physical pool. The pooling of the coal-oil traffic was a physical pool, and the several companies entered into an agreement as to the relative share of the total traffic which each should carry. I could go on at length and further explain this distinction in and division of pools. So if you go over all the arrangements of this character you will find a distinction between these pools, and both should be prohibited, if either.

It seems at this time that after consuming two days on the color line members who have studied this problem can not have two minutes to explain the wisdom of amendments proposed by them. One of mine just defeated was eminently just. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, to strike out all after the word "railroads," in the ninth line, to the end of the section.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 19, noes 70.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg leave to offer an amendment at the close of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the third section the following:

"Unless the rates established by such pooling contracts shall be reasonable and just."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas in charge of this bill had studied the question with the same care that the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] has given to it he would be less ready, it seems to me, to impute ignorance on the one hand and to come to conclusions on the other as to how members would vote under given circumstances. He has announced to this House that I am opposed to all legislation upon this subject; that there is not a word, or a line, or a sentence that I would vote for; and he made that declaration in the face of the fact that I had just announced to the House that I was in favor of regulating the pooling of freights by the establishment of a commission, and I tried to make the House understand that nature was pointing out the way in which this legislation should travel. I tried to point out to the House that experience had established pools, and pools established a commission, and that in the public interest the time had arrived when the public should be represented in the commission, and pools should be legalized and put under the control of a commission.

Doubtless the gentleman from Texas, in his anxiety to forbid pooling, shut his ears to what I have said. But I do not choose to be misrepresented in this matter. I believe the subject ought to be regulated. I believe there is constitutional power to regulate it. I believe it ought to be regulated as experience has shown to be feasible and practicable.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to interrupt him to ask if he has not stated on the floor that he intended to vote for all amendments which would kill the bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have not on the floor, if the gentleman means that, made such a statement in any speech. I suppose he uses the word in its technical sense. If so, I answer——

Mr. REAGAN. I did not mean in a speech.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman means that I used such an expression privately, I answer, yes. I am opposed to the substitute and in favor of the original bill reported by the committee. That is what I have said privately and that I now repeat.

Now, the gentleman says that to legalize and allow pooling would amount to robbery of the public. What were the rates of freight in force before this system of pooling was inaugurated and when the gentleman had begun the agitation of this measure, which he thinks one of reform, but which I think one of reaction? I have the figures here before me. In 1874, the rates of freight which prevailed at that time, before pooling was invented, and when this agitation for the enactment of an interstate-commerce bill had begun, were as set forth in this book in detail. I will refer to grain. On a bushel of grain from Chicago to New York the rate of shipment was then 28.7 cents. Last year the rate, notwithstanding the pooling system, had fallen to 13 cents, or less than one-half of what it was before the agitation began.

Mr. GIBSON. Let me interrupt the gentlemen from New York to ask what was the difference between the price of grain then and now?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That does not concern the question at all. It has no reference to my purpose, nor has it any purpose, so far as I understand it, in this connection. My point is that, in the absence of any other legislation to regulate interstate commerce, the public, so far from having been robbed, have had their expenses of shipments of this character brought down from 28 to 13 cents a bushel.

That has been done by pooling and regulating pooling. Let us take advantage of this fact. Let us continue to pool; let the public come in and regulate the pooling, and prevent the frauds which are always possible when there is no popular regulation.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to oppose the amendment. The discussion begins already to emphasize the unwisdom and injustice of the bill. It is a vain effort to make a code which shall control the management of railways in all cases. But these cases are infinite in number, and very nearly infinite in variety. How absurd to suppose that all these cases can be held in the iron grasp of half a dozen absolute restrictions. Absolute restrictions belong to morals, but have no control in railway management, where each case makes its own right and wrong. You may say to a man, "Thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not bear false witness;" for theft, adultery, and slander are everywhere and always wrong. But you can not say to a railroad company, "You shall not discriminate, you shall not rebate, you shall not pool, you shall not charge more for a longer haul," because in many cases all these methods are right and in many cases they are necessary—necessary even to the very existence of the road. And because they are necessary often to their very existence the railways will elude, evade, and openly transgress the restrictions, looking to popular opinion to shield them from the penalty; just as the gentleman from Texas, if his life were threatened, would, in defending it, violate all laws and escape all punishment.

Nor in so doing are the people indifferent to their rights; they are watchful of them and are willing to judge the future by the past. They see that the laws of man and the laws of nature have shielded them in the past; why should they doubt them in the future? The law of common carriers in every State inhibits injustice and inequality. The laws of nature, acting in the sphere of commerce, make the greed and ambition of man the instruments of justice and equality.

They see that united the result has been a constant triumph of progress and reform. Does any one dispute history? Are there not more railways and better service than ever before? Have we not more trains and better, more equipment and better, cheaper and more efficient management everywhere?

Does the gentleman from Texas deny that goods and passengers are carried cheaper by us than anywhere else in the world, and cheaper by us now than ever before? Perhaps he fears that these great laws of nature have lost their force. Have they? Was competition ever more aggressive on water and on land? Why, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] can not take his first excursions over a new road without seeing from his window the surveying party that already lays the deadly parallel. [Laughter.] And if you fear that some obstacles are too mighty, remember that ten years ago we all said, with the Erie, the Central, and the Pennsylvania railways in the field, New York can secure no relief except from the resources of the national Treasury. But while we spoke competition, raising $100,000,000 without public knowledge or public solicitation, threw the Nickel Plate and West Shore into the arena, and there they will remain. [Applause.]

Nor has the desire to succeed in business ceased to be a rule, which includes railway managers in its healthy influence.

Managers were never more solicitious for business and never more ready to make sacrifices to get it. They know that rivals are so many they must themselves create and develop it, and in a one-sided partnership, where the customer gets all the benefit, they aid him in its creation or development. I challenge contradiction when I say that there never was a time when a company that wished to open a mine or a factory could get better returns than now. It is almost accurate to say that the miner or the manufacturer can fix his own rates for the years of experiment. Nor has the power of public opinion weakened. It controls the management of railways as a management and as individual men. The management knows that the surest path to business is that of public favor; that the popular road makes money, and to secure this popularity they spend money lavishly, they make concessions generously. Nor is generally enough stress laid on the character of the management and their natural desire as men to have the approbation of their neighbors and to secure that good report, that good reputation which is the highest prize of life.

Do not confound the managers of whom I speak, and whom I honor, with the great speculators in its securities, whom I despise. It is the speculators and the stock exchange that receive the public attention; it is the railway and its managers who deserve it. It is a great injustice to confound them. The managers are men of high character and great abilities. Theirs is a profession, and they are proud of it. They are sure to spend their lives in its practice, and most of them practice it in the same railway corporation. They are faithful, public-spirited, and as a rule honored and beloved by those among whom they live and with whom they deal. In their desire to retain and deserve this good opinion of their vicinage they are more apt to sacrifice their road than the public. But the great speculators, unlike you or me or them, remote from intercourse with the customers of the road, are indifferent to public opinion, and should be curbed. But, remember, these men, while their names are allied to the roads, almost never interfere with their practical management. Their sole interest is in the stock. That they seize; they hold it for a day, until they have worked their own wicked will on it, and then they cast it out dishonored, to be the prey of the next adventurer. If they retain it longer, it is only to elect a board of directors which shall suffer them to manipulate the securities, and, that accomplished, their interest ends.

The managers of the road meantime go on with their regular business, and have no more connection with the speculators whose names are in stock circles allied with their roads than you or I, Mr. Speaker, except the bitter disgust with which they see these bad men so confusing the distinction between themselves and the actual managers that in the public mind they are apt to stand in the same light and receive the same censure.

Let, then, the laws of man and of nature continue their work of progress and reform. Why attempt to restrict, why pass restrictions which will interfere with these general laws, which are working out the results you pretend to wish? Your effort is vain; your restrictions will be disregarded. Do you ask me how?

The railways, if these restrictions should become laws, will ostentatiously break them all. They will invite litigation until the wheels of the courts are clogged. That will challenge public attention, and public attention is redress. Or they will issue an order, which the whole railway system shall obey, that every locomotive from sea to sea shall stay in its roundhouse; then there will follow a silence from Portland in Oregon to Portland in Maine that can be felt, and only one voice will be heard, the familiar voice of our Speaker: "The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider a bill to repeal an act entitled 'An act to regulate interstate commerce.' Is there objection?'" Mr. Speaker, just so sure as the report follows the flash, we shall hear as the end of the matter: "The Chair hears none." [Loud applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when the five minutes of Mr. PHELPS had expired, Mr. KEAN obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. PHELPS.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a very proper sequence to the remarkable speech of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] to have read the telegram of Jay Gould to Mr. Cleveland, President-elect. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I think so, too; I would like to hear it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Unfortunately I have no copy of that telegram now at hand.

I am here, Mr. Speaker, simply as a member of Congress, representing the people, not representing any corporate influence. I do not know railroads. I know the body of the people of New York, including many gentlemen connected with our trades-unions, &c., transportation associations, who favor this just and true bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I believe it is our business as Democrats, I will not say as statesmen [laughter and applause], because the gentlemen on the other side never recognize that idea [renewed laughter]—I believe the wise thing to be done is to check corporate power and corporate monopoly. The last election was based on that idea. I would like to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement in which the thing is brought right down to my very dear colleague from New York.

I do not believe in commissions. We had them in 1876. We had them on the tariff. We have had them since, and commissions are not wise or constitutional. Give us commissions, and you will find the people are not represented. Give us a fair show with the people, and railroads will be more or less catechised and a halt will be called on them.

Now I ask for the reading of that very interesting letter in Mr. Dana's New York Sun of this morning.

Before the Clerk had concluded reading the marked portion of the letter,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, said: Who is the author of that?

Mr. COX, of New York. I will have the whole of that letter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But who is the author?

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. S. R. Davis, a gentleman from Iowa, likely one of your constituents. He ran for Congress, but was not elected.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No; we do not elect that kind of fellows.

Mr. COX, of New York. Many were defeated who were good fellows.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time is exhausted.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask for the printing of the whole letter.

There was no objection, and it is as follows:

SHALL CORPORATE POWER BE CHECKED?—AN OPEN LETTER TO HON. S. S. COX.

DEAR SIR: I first became interested in political questions when an apprentice in a printing office in 1868. I was then a pronounced Democrat—as I am to-day. It has been my good fortune to read many of your grand utterances in defense of the principles of constitutional government, and with pride and admiration I have watched your course in the Congress of the United States during all these years of Republican party power.

I have seen with sorrow great evils creeping into our political system, and have witnessed with alarm the growing power of corporate influence. As a citizen of the West, one having the welfare of the laboring people of this country at heart, and desirous of seeing the Democratic party give the people a Democratic administration in the true sense of the term, I take the liberty of addressing you, believing that you are a genuine representative of the people and not the agent of the corporations.

I see that the question of regulating interstate commerce is before Congress, and that there is a bill pending for the appointment of a national railway commission to adjust the differences between the railroads and the people. I hope no Democrat will vote for this swindling artifice, conceived for the benefit of railroad corporations. How can a commission in less than a century attend to the business which might accumulate on its hands? What assurance can the people have that the members of the commission will not be the agents of the corporations? They are not elected by the people and not directly responsible to them. Judge REAGAN'S bill is infinitely preferable.

But what spirit has taken possession of Congress in these latter days? Why does it vote to create so many swindling commissions to perform its own functions?

It was the duty of Congress in 1876 to declare Mr. Tilden President, but it abdicated its power and created the electoral commission, a body unknown to the Constitution, and the people were thus swindled out of the Presidency.

It is the duty of Congress to suppress polygamy, but it preferred rather to turn that business over to three gentlemen known as the Mormon Commission, and how much has that wonderful Commission accomplished?

It was likewise the duty of Congress to reduce the outrageous taxes, but it created a tariff commission, composed of high tariff men, to give the people relief. The Ways and Means Committee of the House could have made a more satisfactory investigation than the tariff commissioners at one-third the expense.

Again, "Congress has the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof," and the Supreme Court says it has power to issue legal-tender Treasury notes, but yet the money of the people is issued on the commission plan. Congress, instead of controlling the volume of currency, delegates its power to corporations, whose interests prompt them to keep money scarce enough to make interest high, and thus oppress the people and depress trade.

The people of the West are hoping and praying that the railway commission bill will be killed in Congress. It will certainly do no good, and give the railroads a loophole through which to escape from their obligation and responsibility to the public, whose creatures they are. Iowa and Wisconsin have the railway commission system, and they have proved beneficial only to the railroads, whose pliant tools they are. It is the duty of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and prevent extortion upon the people from railroad corporations. It should not shirk that responsibility by creating a body to do the work it was itself elected to perform.

I hope that you and your Democratic associates in Congress will stand firmly for the rights of the people, and give the national banks and railroad monopolies to understand that the people are sovereign, and not the corporations.

Yours, truly,

S. R. DAVIS.

CRESTON, IOWA, December 13, 1884.

Mr. COX, of New York. I also ask to print an extract from Mr. REAGAN'S speech to show the animus and reasoning in general for this bill.

There was no objection, and the extract is as follows:

I might multiply such evidences of opinion of impartial, disinterested, and patriotic men of all parts of the country; and I invite you to contrast them with the interested, selfish opinions of railroad lawyers and railroad managers and experts, paid for by the railroads out of money wrung from the hard earnings of people engaged in other vocations. Do you think such a question can be whistled down the wind by the vast throng of mercenaries who infest the halls and corridors and committee-rooms of Congress, for the purpose of influencing the action of members whenever this question comes up for consideration?

The wishes of the people on this subject may be baffled and delayed for a time, on pretexts reasonable and unreasonable. But when we consider the magnitude of the interest involved; that the transportation of not less than three thousand million dollars' worth of commerce annually, in which 50,000,000 people are interested; that the larger part of this is interstate commerce; that in all the world's history so much of interest has not been left without the protection of law, and to the mercy of a class of persons interested in levying the largest exactions on it; and when we consider the principles involved, and the probable, nay, the almost inevitable, consequences to the property interests, the prosperity, the happiness, and ultimately the dangers to our liberties and form of government, I say to you, in all seriousness, action by Congress on this subject can not much longer be delayed. So many interests are so constantly affected that all men must see a solution of this problem must come; and I do not think it can ever come through a more just or more conservative measure than the one now before you.

This measure was not conceived in hostility to the railroads. Their great value as a means of progress and prosperity are fully understood by all. No good citizen could wish to cripple or to harm them. No one would hail with more pleasure than myself their prosperity. My judgment is that the passage of the bill before us would benefit them, while it would benefit and protect the people.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to limit debate on the pending section and amendment to five minutes.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. HORR. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will not limit debate. We have not had any debate on this as yet. We have had nothing but essay reading.

Mr. REAGAN. I will give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. REED. I suggest he give us half an hour's debate.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be glad to do it, but debate on this subject has been exhausted.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman thinks it has been exhaustively discussed, there are other gentlemen here who have not that impression about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is not debatable.

Mr. HORR. I hope the gentleman will give us half an hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be glad to do so, but I wish to get this measure out of the way of other business.

Mr. REED. The gentleman will facilitate his business by doing so.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman is disposed to block business he can do so.

Mr. REED. No one is disposed to block business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is not debatable.

Mr. REED. Under what rule is it not debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Motions to limit debate are not debatable.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman point out any such decision?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Chair has decided the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has been the ruling in the Committee of the Whole and the ruling of the House when the previous question is demanded to cut off debate.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order, under the rule of the House etablished yesterday, there was no limitation of debate on a question of this kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's point of order is overruled.

Mr. REED rose. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided the point of order.

Mr. REED. The gentleman can exercise the force of his position, of course, and can take advantage of it. [Cries of "Regular order!"] My point of order is made in good faith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair has ruled upon it in good faith.

Mr. REED. There is no such rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order was addressed to the Chair, and the Chair has ruled upon it.

Mr. REED. The Chair ruled on it in a peculiar way. [Cries of "Regular order!"] You can not howl us down. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. If the gentleman from Maine wants to, let him take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 2.

Mr. HORR. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'HARA. I move the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 186, not voting 129; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. O'HARA. I object.

The Clerk then recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HOUK, for this day.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON, for this day.

Mr. MURPHY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, until further notice.

Mr. WELLER with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, until further notice.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. DAVIDSON, for this day.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I wish to state that this pair was in existence when the last roll-call took place, but I believe it was not announced.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to limit debate, on which the yeas and nays were ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he is not willing to allow ten minutes for debate to this side of the House on this question.

Mr. REAGAN. Undoubtedly it would be better to give ten minutes than to consume time in calling the roll, if that would be satisfactory. Can the gentleman speak for that side of the House? Unless the gentleman can speak for that side, I could not undertake to consent to such an arrangement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to ask unanimous consent that ten minutes be allowed for debate on this section and the pending amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. My proposition was that ten minutes be given to this side of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. If that can be reached by unanimous consent, I will consent to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the House. Is there unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be set aside and that ten minutes be given for debate, the time to be consumed by the gentlemen on the other side?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield the time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR was recognized.

INVESTIGATION OF MARSHAL FOR SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Michigan proceeds I would like to ask unanimous consent to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts with reference to a matter that ought to be disposed of promptly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania submitting a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 2d day of December, 1884, authorizing an investigation into the conduct of Lot Wright, United States marshal for the southern district of Ohio, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following, to wit:

"'The Clerk of the House upon the order of the chairman of said subcommittee shall advance to him, in amounts not exceeding $1,000 at a time, such sums as may be required to meet the expenses of said subcommittee, said amounts to be properly accounted for by proper vouchers duly certified by the chairman.'"

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution, approved December 18, 1884, having considered the same, report herewith a substitute for the resolution and recommend its passage.

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 2d day of December, 1884, authorizing an investigation into the conduct of Lot Wright, United States marshal for the southern district of Ohio, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following, to wit:

"The Clerk of the House upon the order of the chairman of said subcommittee shall advance to him in amounts not exceeding $1,000 at a time, and not exceeding in the aggregate under this resolution the sum of $3,000, to meet the necessary expenses of said subcommittee, said amounts to be properly accounted for by proper vouchers duly certified by the chairman."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear from the gentleman in charge of this matter what the purpose is in limiting the amount that is proposed to be allowed for this very important investigation. I yield to him for an answer.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The explanation is that the committee did not see the propriety of any committee of this House being allowed to dispose of the contingent fund of the House without limit; and as it was understood that this resolution and the moneys called for by it were to meet certain expenditures which are expected to be made during the holiday recess, after consultation with the chairman of the committee this substitute was agreed to for the amount proposed in the original resolution which was referred to the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. But, Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that this is a final limitation of the expenditure for that investigation?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. There is no provision for a further appropriation to meet the expenses.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. It is always in the control of the House to make such appropriations, and this substitute was prepared by the committee to meet what they believed to be the necessities of the case. This investigation will occur during the recess; and the committee, upon consultation, as I said before, with the chairman of the investigating committee, concluded that this amount would be satisfactory. There is no disposition, I will add for the information of the gentleman from Ohio, to withhold any sums necessary for the purposes of investigation that the committee may find necessary.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want it to be understood that this is final.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why the substitute is proposed in place of the amendment submitted to the committee. Some time ago a resolution like this was proposed, authorizing the chairman of one of the committees of this House to appropriate all the money required in an investigation in sums of $1,000 at a time, and we thought it was playing a little too much havoc with our contingent fund to propose to appropriate it in such a way without limit. We desire to control it to some extent at least, if the Committee on Accounts have power to do so. With that I hope the gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. KEIFER. The amount proposed to be appropriated is inconsiderable in view of the fact that we are about to embark on an exceedingly extensive investigation. If the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice or the subcommittee is to be limited in its expenditures in this way, I am a little suspicious that just a certain class of testimony will be gathered and that we will get a report here that will not cover the entire case; and it will probably not be the fault of the committee that enters upon the investigation. If there is to be but $3,000—the sum fixed in the resolution if I understood it aright—expended in this investigation, it seems to me that will be expended in gathering up testimony on the affirmative of this proposition; and the great question, covering the testimony of perhaps a few thousand witnesses, at a very considerable cost to the Government, will be left entirely unsettled, and the Congress of the United States and the country will be without the desired information.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that there can be no fear of that. If the gentleman had paid attention to the language of the resolution he would have seen it speaks of moneys advanced before expenses are incurred. It is to cover that that the resolution is drawn.

Mr. KEIFER. But this is a limitation.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. It is, as I have said, a limitation of moneys advanced before expenses are incurred.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the Clerk again read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. If the gentleman from Ohio has no more questions to ask I will call the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. I have not yielded the floor. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] has any further suggestions to make I am willing to hear him. I am anxious to understand this matter. The proposition here is to place a complete limitation upon the expenditures of the committee, the limitation being $3,000.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The resolution does not do that. But it is not proposed to give power to the chairman of any committee to advance sums in unlimited amount.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the economic reason given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and appreciate it, I hope. But I do not think it is possible for this committee to enter upon an investigation, with so much involved and having such a wide scope as this, and get along with an expenditure of $3,000. I do not know but many more than 3,000 witnesses are to be called.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has any further suggestion to make.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I move the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. I think I have the floor. If the gentleman desires to ask a question I will yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BAGLEY). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] has the floor and refuses to yield.

Mr. KEIFER. I have been debating this question for a considerable time, and have not yielded the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania except to permit him to ask a question; and now I am not to be taken from the floor because the distinguished gentleman who has been lately occupying the chair [Mr. SPRINGER] has just left it.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I do not understand that I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania simply yielded to the gentleman from Ohio for a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I addressed the Chair, and the notes of the reporter will show that I proceeded to debate the resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] asked me questions, and I have been willing to hear him in order that I may understand the resolution. I think the gentleman who has just left the chair [Mr. SPRINGER] understands this to be the position. I do not intend to offer any factious opposition, but I want this matter to be fairly understood.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] asked me for an explanation. I gave it. That did not take me from the floor. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER addressed the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the Chair has already ruled that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] is entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the floor. He was so informed by the gentleman who resigned the chair [Mr. SPRINGER] a moment ago. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KEIFER. But does the Chair claim the right to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania while I am occupying the floor by the recognition of the former occupant of the chair?

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope I may be allowed one moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT].

Mr. KEIFER. The Chair has the power to do that, but not the right.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I move the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for one moment?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KEIFER. Now I ask for recognition by the Chair to debate this question under the rule.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. KEIFER. The regular order is debate for thirty minutes on this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been debate on it.

Mr. KEIFER. But the Chair has just decided I did not debate it, and did not have the floor to debate it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] debated the question. That gentleman had the floor, and the gentleman from Ohio rose simply to ask a question, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded for a question and nothing else, as the Chair understands.

Mr. KEIFER. Then debate did not follow under the ruling of the Chair; and hence I am entitled now to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was debate by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KEIFER. There has been no debate under the rule. We are entitled to thirty minutes after the previous question has been ordered, to be equally divided between those supporting the resolution and those opposing it. That right is given under, I think, the last paragraph of Rule XXVIII.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided the question. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the Chair hold that debate is not in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further debate is in order.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HART. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). On what motion?

Mr. HART. On the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 46 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 56, not voting 130; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will announce the additional pairs.

The following-named members were announced as paired for the remainder of the day:

Mr. DOWD with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. MURRAY with Mr. HOWEY.

Mr. HENLEY with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. WAIT.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. PARKER.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

A bill (S. 1008) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi reservations, in Idaho, May 14, 1880, for the sale of a portion of their lands in said Territory, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same;

A bill (S. 1303) to grant the right of way over the public lands of the United States to the Lost Lake and Mount Hood Improvement Company;

A bill (S. 2417) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; and Joint resolution (S. R. 92) authorizing and requiring the Secretary of War to deliver to the Eighth New York Heavy Artillery Association the regimental colors which belonged to said artillery, and which are now in the custody of the Secretary of War.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] is entitled to the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, this debate strangely enough, at its very close, seemed to take a very wide range. I had supposed we were discussing a question as to the policy of permitting railroad companies to pool their earnings. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], whom I do not now see in the House, saw fit to get the floor and cause to be read a letter from some gentleman—or rather some "crank"—from the West; and then, as if by a preconcerted plan, the gentleman from Texas, in order to muzzle this side of the House and prevent us from investigating the important questions presented by that letter, tries to shut down the valve and prevent the escape of all sentiments upon that question.

The gentleman from New York—I am sorry he is not here—introduced this letter of some one from the West, whom I have seen fit to designate as a "crank." That I may prove to the House that the designation is accurate, I wish to have read the first part of that letter, a portion which the gentleman from New York omitted to have read in the presence of the House. I will ask the Clerk to read it, just the first paragraph.

Mr. COX, of New York (entering the Hall). Can not I read it myself?

Mr. HORR. No; the Clerk will read it. But I am glad that the gentleman is here. I am having read, Mr. Speaker, a portion of that letter which the gentleman from New York omitted to have read; and I desire the reading of this portion as an explanation of why the gentleman had the rest of the letter read, and also to prove to this House the truth of my assertion that the letter came from some "crank." I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO HON. S. S. COX.

DEAR SIR: I first became interested in political questions when an apprentice in a printing office in 1868. I was then a pronounced Democrat, as I am to-day.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has been my good fortune to read many of your grand utterances in defense of the principles of constitutional government, and with pride and admiration I have watched your course in the Congress of the United States during all these years of Republican power.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HORR. That is sufficient to sustain my statements. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the burden of the letter which the gentleman saw fit to have read for the edification of the members of this House was a trite and worn-out notion that all the commissions of this country heretofore have been failures. And, true to his Democratic instincts, he cites first and foremost among them the commission of 1876—the electoral commission.

So far as my memory goes that was a commission forced upon this country by a vote of Democratic Senators; also by a Democratic House. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Democratic side.] Oh, yes! I have the vote right here. A Democratic House passed the bill to create that commission. Out of 191 votes in this branch of Congress for the commission, 131 Democrats voted to compel the people of this country to settle that question by a commission. Only 18 Democrats voted "no."

The gentleman from New York voted "yea," and a majority of the Republicans voted against the bill. The commission, thus proposed and organized by Democratic votes, examined the case and settled it under their consciences as honest men. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Democratic side.] I repeat, on their oaths they settled it as honest men, and the very party which forced that commission upon the people has been whining about it from that day down to the present time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, another commission which this gentleman assails is the commission that took testimony in reference to the tariff question and made a report on this subject to Congress. This man, in his wisdom, states that that commission was a failure, and that the subject should have been left to the Ways and Means Committee of this House. We have had a little taste of the Ways and Means Committee and of that commission. The Ways and Means Committee of the present House investigated the tariff, and in the abundance of their wisdom reported to this House a bill which, as they claimed, would relieve the toiling millions of this nation, and in this House, with seventy-two Democratic majority, the head of that bill was taken right off before we were hardly permitted to enter the threshold of the subject.

Mr. GIBSON. Was not that motion supported by every Republican vote?

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, a Democratic majority of seventy-two, if they believe in anything, ought to be able to stand by it in the Halls of the American Congress. We Republicans differ with those gentlemen on the tariff question. I believe that tariff commission did a good work; I believe it did its duty faithfully; and to-day my objection to the bill of the gentleman from Texas is that it attempts by iron-clad rules to govern the great commercial arteries of this country, which can not be governed in that way. And when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] was speaking upon that question I held my breath to hear from that side of the House so much good sense. [Laughter.] It was so unusual.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the trouble with the bill of the gentleman from Texas is that it undertakes to do here in this House a thing which can only be done by a commission composed of men who can sit down and examine each and every case by itself, and thus be able to get at all the difficulties of the subject and decide each transaction intelligently. I am in favor of such a commission.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Several MEMBERS. Debate is closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gavel has been broken in trying to keep me down. I hope there will be unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, debate has been closed upon the pending amendment and upon the section under consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. I shall seek recognition on the next paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], which the Clerk will again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the third section the words "unless the rates established by said pooling contracts shall be reasonable and just."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUDD. In pursuance of an understanding with the gentleman from Texas in charge of this bill I propose the following amendment, to correct the evils pointed out by me in my remarks:

Strike out, after the word "railroads," in line 12, the words "by dividing" and insert the words "or to divide."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out the words "receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling."

Mr. Speaker, the only purpose of inserting such words in a bill like this is to prevent a railway company from making an unfair charge for transportation of goods and concealing that charge under the disguise of a charge for receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling goods, or for other terminal service. There is no need of such words in this particular bill, because immediately afterward, in section 5, you have a provision for printed schedules of rates in which the company is obliged to declare what part of a charge is for the service of transportation and what part is for storing or handling or other terminal facilities.

And I desire to remind the gentleman from Texas—and I beg to assure him I make this amendment in perfect good faith—that the practical effect of inserting these words in the bill will be to prevent certain localities in the country from enjoying the facilities for which they have already paid large sums of money. It is well known to every one familiar with this question that up to ten years ago the city of New York, having, or believing she had, the monopoly of the Western freight, became careless about her terminal facilities, and the cities of Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, for the purpose of taking away some part of that freight from the city of New York, spent a large amount of money in the building of docks and warehouses, whereby they rendered the handling of freight in those places cheaper than before, and New York was forced to follow the example of those cities. And in the city of Chicago there was built not many years ago what is known as a belt railway. It encircles that city on the land side, intersecting every railway that terminates there. Its function is to facilitate the transfer of freight from one railroad line to another. Its effect is to diminish the cost of the handling of freight in the city of Chicago. Why should not that city be allowed to get the benefit of low rates for handling goods for which it has paid?

Other facilities have been granted the railroads centering in Chicago by the people of that city, and at the expense of the people of that city. They have changed the grades of streets there to facilitate the building of viaducts in order to diminish the cost of handling freights.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I hope I will be allowed to continue for two or three minutes longer in further explanation of the provisions of the bill. I do it in good faith, as I have no desire to delay a vote on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer that debate shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the floor and yield to my colleague.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that that body further insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is to strike out from the fifth line of section 4 the words "receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling." Now, what will be the effect of it? Why, it would enable the railroads to make gross charges for receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling, and other terminal facilities. There would be no protection against the power of railroads to discriminate if that amendment were adopted, as will be seen by reading the preceding part of the section. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad.

In the fifth section of this bill it is provided, in lines 11, 12, and 13, as follows:

And the accounts for such service—

That is, for receiving, delivering, loading, unloading, storing, and handling the same—

And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

If you will let the sections stand as they are the country will be protected against the power of discrimination, but if you sustain the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and allow the railroad companies to make aggregate charges for receiving, storing, delivering, handling, and other terminal facilities, the effect will be to destroy the protective features of this bill. It will destroy entirely the effect of the bill, and I do not know a gentleman who more quietly and gently comes to destroy the bill than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas and this House to the necessary effect of this provision. I have shown already, I think, and the House will see from considering this section, it is not necessary.

Now I ask the House to consider whether it is reasonable. It is a provision against a certain rule of charging for a shorter as compared with a longer distance. You can not charge more for storing at Harrisburg than you can charge for storing at Pittsburgh, if the freight comes from a point west of either of those points. But if it comes from a point east of these two points, then you can not charge less for storing at Pittsburgh than you can at Harrisburg, and the consequence of the law would be that the charges for storing of goods and for switching and for other terminal facilities will be precisely the same sum at every other intermediate part of the line running from Chicago to New York. And yet in one place the people of a town may have spent millions of money in order to make the cost of handling goods low by providing proper facilities, while in another place they may not have spent one cent, and have provided no facilities for this service.

I wish to remind this House that when we establish a rule as between charging for a longer than a shorter distance, it depends upon the assumption that there is some natural or reasonable ratio between such charges. But there can be no possible reason for establishing a certain ratio between the cost of a certain service at Pittsburgh and the cost of similar service at Harrisburg depending merely upon the question as to whether you sent the goods from a point east of those places or west of them, that being the only rule for determining the charge. There are other questions that enter into the consideration of the problem. The cost depends upon the expense of labor at those places. It depends upon the application of steam at those places. It depends upon other things which have nothing in the world to do with the distance over which goods have been carried before they reach the one or the other of those places. The provision as it now stands does, it seem to me, tend to make a burlesque of the bill, and I think it ought to be stricken out.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 46, noes 80.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, addressed the Chair.

Mr. WOODWARD. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, and Mr. REAGAN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is agreeable to the House now I will move that we take the usual recess until the time fixed by the order of the House, 8 o'clock.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am willing to yield for a motion for a recess, with the understanding that I have the floor when this subject again comes up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the fourth section, commencing with the word "that," in line 1, down to and including the word "and," at the beginning of line 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the consideration of this amendment, the gentleman from Texas moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock for the consideration of business heretofore ordered by the House.

JOHN B. DOYLE AND WILLIAM STANTON.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7786) for the relief of John B. Doyle and William Stanton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF HELL GATE, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a report of the Chief of Engineers relative to the use of the appropriations for the improvement of Hell Gate, New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

ART COLLECTION—JAMES L. CLAGHORN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the president of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, with the resolution adopted by the directors of that institution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COSGROVE, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARLETON, indefinitely.

To Mr. OATES, until January 5.

To Mr. HOUSEMAN, indefinitely.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Frank A. M. Kreps, certified copies of the same having been left with the file clerk of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask consent to offer a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done now by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion temporarily to allow gentlemen having bills to introduce them for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. REAGAN. Several gentlemen have asked me if the recess tonight is for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this bill. I will be glad to have the Chair announce the purpose of the evening session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has announced that it was for the consideration of business under the order of the House, heretofore made, fixing Friday evening sessions for the consideration of pension business exclusively.

THOMAS R. MONOHAN.

Mr. HEPBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas it is reported that Thomas R. Monohan, an American citizen, has been arrested by officers of the Republic of Mexico, and incarcerated in a Mexican prison and denied a trial:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to this House any information he may have upon the subject of said arrest and imprisonment.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Mr. BLANCHARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 303) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to reciprocity treaties affecting the revenues; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SAMSON GOLIAH.

Mr. ENGLISH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7787) for the relief of Samson Goliah; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF HOUSE FOLDERS.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7788) to equalize the pay of House folders; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

PREVENTION OF CHOLERA.

Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 304) to appropriate a sum of money for distribution and expenditure, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prevent the entrance and spread of cholera in the cities surrounding the port of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

G. B. HARBER AND W. H. SCHUETZE.

Mr. MCADOO. I also ask unanimous consent to make two reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was only given for the introduction of bills.

Mr. MCADOO. I think there will be no objection to my making those reports.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 205) to credit Lieutenants Giles B. Harber and William H. Schuetze with sea-duty and sea-pay while engaged in the search for Lieutenant Chipp and party, and also for the time employed in bringing home the remains of Lieut. Commander De Long and party; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JEANNETTE EXPLORING PARTY.

Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1039) for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette, and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the House to concur in the Senate amendments to a House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Leave was merely given for the introduction of bills for reference.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] yielded to me, and I think there will be no objection. The bill makes no appropriation, is local in its nature, and simply makes changes in judicial districts in Tennessee.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table; and the amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after "issuing," insert the words "except as hereinafter provided."

Page 2, at the end of line 3, insert "And provided further, That all prosecutions for crimes or offenses heretofore committed in either of said counties shall be commenced and prosecuted as if this act had not been passed."
Amend the title so as to read:
"An act detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern division of the district of East Tennessee and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes."

Mr. McMILLIN. I move concurrence in the Senate amendments.
The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.
Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

G. H. BURROWS.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7789) granting a pension to G. H. Burrows, late a private in Company C, Third New York Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 1793) to amend section 4434, title 52, Revised Statutes of the United States concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam vessels, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Whereas there is a great inequality in the amounts paid to the different employés in the folding-room of this House, and still greater inequalities between the amount paid the House employés and that paid the Senate employés in the same department for the same service: Therefore,
Be it resolved, That the employés in the House folding-room be paid a uniform salary at the rate of $3 per day.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the order of the House a recess is now taken until 8 o'clock this evening. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

EVENING SESSION.

The House at 8 o'clock resumed its session, and was called to order by Mr. BAGLEY, as Speaker pro tempore.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the session is held this evening.
The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the consideration of business under the order just read.
The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

JOSEPH RAIBLE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Joseph Raible, of Indiana, who lost an arm above the elbow during the war, while firing a salute at the city of Indianapolis, Ind., under the direction of the quartermaster-general of Indiana; and that said Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to pay him at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible, report:
That Joseph Raible enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company A, Thirty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, September 10, 1861, and was honorably discharged September, 1864.
October 2, 1882, he was placed on the pension-roll at $1 per month, for partial deafness of left ear, contracted in the military service of the United States.
July 3, 1865, after his discharge from the military service of the United States, while in the military service of the State of Indiana, and in pursuance of an order from General Stone, assistant quartermaster-general at Indianapolis, while engaged in aiding in firing a salute in honor of the arrival home for muster-out of the Sixty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, by the fault of thumber, No. 3, at the gun (claimant being No. 1, rammer), there was a premature discharge of the gun, blowing off the soldier's right arm, which was amputated three inches above the elbow.
It is shown by the evidence in this case that the soldier was acting under orders from Assistant Quartermaster-General Stone, of the United States Army, on duty at Indianapolis, at the time of receiving the disability which resulted in the loss of his arm, and that he was performing a military duty at the time. Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by the following: After the word "month," in line 9, "in lieu of all other pensions now paid him;" and when so amended that the bill pass.

The amendment reported by the committee, to add to the bill the words "in lieu of all other pensions now paid him," was read and agreed to.
There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM BOONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 374) granting a pension to William Boone.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William Boone, late a private in Company F, Eighty-eighth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 374) granting a pension to William Boone, have had the same under consideration and report:
That William Boone was a private in Company F, Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. November, 1862, he was taken prisoner and paroled; and while at Aurora, Ill., on parole, July 4, 1863, while engaged in firing a salute in celebration of the fall of Vicksburg, by the premature discharge of a cannon he was assisting to fire, he lost his right arm, and his left hand was injured so as to render it partially and permanently useless. He testifies in his own behalf that the citizens of said town were engaged in said celebration, and "That he participated therein at the special request of said citizens, because he was a soldier, and because it became him so to do as a soldier and a patriot."
He has not filed a declaration in the Pension Office, because, he says, he understood there were technical objections to granting a pension in his case under the rules and regulations of the Pension Office.
The granting of a pension is strongly urged by the late Governor Williams and other distinguished citizens of Indiana. The surviving officers of claimant's regiment unite in a petition asking that his name be placed on the pension-roll, and assert that he was a gallant soldier, and faithfully, courageously, and honorably discharged his duties as a soldier, and that by reason of his physical disabilities, which were caused and exist as above stated, his capacity to earn a maintenance for himself, his wife, and three children, who depend upon him, is almost entirely destroyed.
This case appeals strongly to the equity of Congress, and in view of the precedents for granting a pension in such cases, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TREADWELL SEAMAN, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2485) for the relief of Treadwell Seaman, jr.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rerate the pension of Treadwell Seaman, jr., formerly of Company E, Second Regiment United States Volunteers, at $15 per month, commencing at discharge from the military service deducting therefrom the amount that has been paid.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2485) for the relief of Treadwell Seaman, jr., having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:
The petitioner was mustered into the service of the United States at New York city on the 5th day of March, 1863, as second lieutenant of Company E, Second Regiment United States Volunteers, Ullman's brigade, and was honorably discharged at New Orleans on the 30th of June, 1864, being at the time of discharge first lieutenant of Company K, Seventy-ninth Regiment United States Colored Infantry. He was attacked with inguinal hernia during the siege of Port Hudson, La., in the months of May and June, 1863, caused by overexertion and work in the rifle-pits during the siege, and being obliged to be in the saddle both night and day frequently, and exposed to the inclemencies of the season. He never received treatment in any general hospital of the United States, but the surgeon of the regiment, Dr. Charles L. Fisher, examined him and advised him to get a truss at once, which advice he followed. Determined not to succumb to the disability, from which he suffered greatly, he continued in the performance of his duty until his discharge.
He made no application for a pension until February 23, 1871, from an honest pride and desire not to be a pensioner, but his failing health and inability to perform the labor necessary to his subsistence impelled him to the act. The Pension Office granted him $7.50 a month on the 18th of September, 1872, with arrears from the time of discharge in 1864, for "left inguinal hernia." The petitioner alleges that his disability was improperly rated, and that he should have been pensioned for "double hernia." In 1881 he made application for increase of pension on this ground, but it was rejected, because the claimant could not find officers or surgeons to establish the "double hernia." The affidavit of Lieutenant Bertholf, who was adjutant of the Second United States Volunteers, seems to point plainly to the existence of the trouble at that time. After testifying to the arduous services of Lieutenant Seaman at Port Hudson, he says:
"The double inguinal hernia was received while engaged night and day in the rifle-pits, and he knows the facts by reason of being regimental adjutant, and that he favored the applicant as much as possible, as a great number of the officers were down with fevers and off duty, and Seaman was called upon to do more duty than he would have done otherwise, and no doubt this extra duty forced upon him brought on the hernia as before stated."
The affidavit of Alexander Haddon, M. D., proves that the soldier was suffering from the double hernia when he returned from the Army. He says:
"He was a sound, healthy man, and free from hernia both at and previous to enlistment, and that he knows it from having been his family physician since 1860. On returning from the Army, Seaman was broken down in health and suffering from double inguinal hernia, and since his return has been an invalid and unable to perform any ordinary labor in consequence of said hernia and the effects of malarial fever, which he contracted in the service. I treated him for the fever and advised him concerning a double inguinal hernia, which he at that time had."
Thomas F. Smith, M. D., testifies:
"That he treated claimant from June, 1871, to spring of 1877. He was suffering from the effects of intermittent fever, rendering him unable during a great portion of the time from performing any manual labor. During that time he would be confined to the house with severe nervous prostration for two and three weeks at a time. He was and is now suffering from double inguinal hernia, and, as a member of United States examining surgeons in New York city, I applied for a double truss for him in 1872."

W. J. Van Pett testifies:

"Have known the claimant for about eighteen years. He was engaged in the New York post-office for about thirteen years, from January 23, 1865, and assigned to the department of which I was superintendent. Nervous prostration and general debility caused him at that time to absent himself frequently from duty, often months at a time. I have called upon him at his house during such sickness, and have always considered him as a broken-down man in health, which in the end was the cause of his leaving the postal service."

Five examining surgeons subscribe to a certificate which contains this language:

"Judging from his present condition and from the evidence before us, it is our belief that the said disability did originate in the service in the line of duty, and that the disability is permanent."

Your committee are of the opinion that the petitioner is not receiving a pension commensurate with his disability, and recommend the passage of House bill 2485, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "month" in line 6.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out at the end of the bill the words "commencing at discharge from the military service, deducting therefrom the amount that has been paid," was read and agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. D. P. WOODBURY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6703) to increase the pension of Mrs. D. P. Woodbury.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension now paid Mrs. D. P. Woodbury, widow of General D. P. Woodbury, to the sum of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to hear the report read in this case.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6703) to increase the pension of Mrs. D. P. Woodbury, report as follows:

The petitioner is the widow of Daniel P. Woodbury, who was commissioned a brigadier-general of the Army of the United States on the 19th of March, 1862, and who died at Key West, Fla., on the 15th day of August, 1864, of yellow fever, contracted while in the service. Widow's application for pension was filed December 9, 1864, and the proof being complete, she was allowed a pension of $30 per month from the time of her husband's death.

She now asks Congress to increase her pension to $50 per month. She is sixty-four years of age.

In a letter dated May 10, 1884, she states that she needs this increase for her support, and that the necessity for said increase has always existed; that she is obliged to take a part of the pay of her son, who is a lieutenant in the Army, and is therefore dependent. She refers to General Meigs, late Quartermaster-General, and General Wright, of the Engineers, who she is sure will indorse her statement.

General Woodbury was commanding officer of the volunteer forces at Key West, Fla., and was breveted major-general on the day of his death.

As numerous precedents exist for granting to the widows of general officers the amount asked for in this bill, and as she seems to need the same for her support, your committee think an exception should be made in this case, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN T. BRAKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6803) granting a pension to John T. Brake.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the rules and regulations of the Pension Office, the name of John T. Brake, late of Company F, Sixth Regiment Provisional Militia of Missouri Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FYAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 6803 submit the following report:

That John T. Brake originally belonged to Company F, Sixth Provisional Regiment Missouri Militia; that he and said company were subsequently mustered in as Company F, Sixteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry.

That evidence in this case shows that said Brake was a private in Company F, Sixteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and in the month of January, 1865, was taken sick with measles; that he was sent home by his captain for treatment, and was confined to his bed for seven weeks with said disease. On the 28th day of February, 1865, he returned to his command for duty; that by reason of exposure the measles settled on his lungs, resulting in asthma and chronic bronchial trouble and soreness and weakness of the lungs.

That on the least exertion or when getting warm, and every winter, he is afflicted with a severe cold and spits up blood; that he is entirely unable to do any kind of manual labor during the spring and winter months, and very little labor at other times in the year. These facts are sworn to by a number of witnesses; among the rest, the captain of his company, and by David Smittle, a sergeant of said company, who have known him intimately, and frequently been at said Brake's house from 1865 up to 1884. Also, by William Brinkly and Zilpha Brinkly, who made their home with Brake for years.

Dr. William J. James, an eminent physician, swears he has been the family physician of Brake for a number of years; that he has frequently attended him for his attacks of asthma, which are terribly severe; that in addition to asthma Brake is suffering with chronic pharyngitis and laryngitis in a very bad form; that he is constantly troubled with a bad cough, the result of a diseased condition of the lungs, and that he is disabled for manual labor more than one-half his time.

Brake is a sober, temperate, good citizen; a very poor man, and with a large family of small children.

Your committee recommend the bill be amended by striking out "Sixth Provisional Regiment Missouri Militia" and inserting "Sixteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry;" and that so amended it do pass.

The following amendment reported by the committee was read and agreed to:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "Sixth Regiment Provisional Militia of Missouri Volunteers" and insert "Sixteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry."

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH C. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1841) granting a pension to Sarah C. Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah C. Thomas, widow of Samuel M. Thomas, late a private in Company K, Eighteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill has been reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions adversely.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. CULLEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1841, granting a pension to Sarah C. Thomas, respectfully report:

That claimant is the widow of Samuel M. Thomas, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company K, Eighteenth Illinois Volunteers, March 4, 1865, and was honorably discharged December 16, 1865.

November 1, 1879, the soldier filed a declaration for pension, alleging that in August, 1865, at Pine Bluff, Ark., he contracted rheumatism, which was rejected June 15, 1881, on the ground of no disability since discharge. The case was subsequently resubmitted. Pending the final adjudication claimant died, and his widow was substituted and attempted to perfect the evidence, and abandoned it September 12, 1882.

The Adjutant-General's report shows soldier's regiment was not at Pine Bluff, Ark., at the time of contracting the alleged disability

It is shown that the soldier was examined a number of times by different examining boards and surgeons, who all agree that soldier was not suffering from the disability complained of, and the only evidence of disability during service is found in the fact that soldier was treated in hospital at Pine Bluff, Ark., from October 7 to November 22, 1865, for intermittent fever.

May 18, 1881, the husband of claimant was examined by the United States examining surgeon of White County, Illinois, who reports him not suffering from rheumatism, but in the last stages of consumption.

We have examined the case very carefully, and find no evidence connecting disability of claimant's husband with his military service, and therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

JAMES D. KIRK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4079) granting a pension to James D. Kirk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of James D. Kirk, of Inez, Martin County, Kentucky, and pay him a pension from the date of expiration of his term of service in Company B, One hundred and sixty-seventh Regiment West Virginia Militia, at the rate allowed by law to private soldiers for disabilities incurred while in the service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion, for wounds and injuries sustained by the said James D. Kirk while in the line of his duty during the said war of the rebellion.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I call for the reading of the report on this case.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4079) granting a pension to James D. Kirk, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the papers on file in the Pension Office that James D. Kirk, while serving as a private in Company B, One hundred and sixty-seventh Regiment West Virginia Militia, and returning with his command to Lawrence County, Kentucky, from a scout to Logan County, West Virginia, was accidentally wounded in right hand by the discharge of his gun while in the act of passing it through a fence. The ball passed through the palm of the hand, fracturing the middle metacarpal bones, causing the drawing up and consequent shortening of the fingers.

The fact of the injury and its incurrence in line of duty is fully shown by the affidavit of the officer and others of the command. The date of the injury is given as November 25, 1862. After recovery from the wound Kirk became a member of Company I, Thirty-ninth Kentucky Infantry, and served from August 28, 1863, until mustered out, as first sergeant, September 15, 1865.

The claim has been rejected by the Pension Office because the applicant at time of injury was not in the service of the United States.

The command to which claimant belonged it is true was a State organization, but its services were valuable to the Government, and in fact the militia of the several States were co-operating with the forces of the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, and their services are recognized in the pension laws for wounds or injuries received while in an engagement, provided the claim was prosecuted to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1874.

This, as well as preceding Congresses, have recognized the services of the militiamen by granting pensions for those who are excluded from the provisions of the general pension laws; and believing this case to be meritorious, your committee report favorably on the bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all between the word "Kentucky," in line 5, and the word "in," in line 7, and insert therein instead the words "late of."

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

Strike out, in lines 5, 6, and 7, the words "Kentucky, and pay him a pension from the date of expiration of his term of service in" and insert "late of."

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to inquire how this amendment will leave the bill with respect to the question of arrears.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is the question which I desired to ask.

Mr. MATSON. I presume (I have not a copy of the bill at my desk) that the amendment was designed to cut out arrears.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask that the bill as it will stand if amended be read.

The bill with the amendment was read.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is all right.

Mr. GIBSON. What service does the committee report Mr. Kirk was in at the time he received this accidental injury?

The CHAIRMAN. The statement of the report is that he was a private of the Sixty-seventh Regiment West Virginia Militia.

Mr. GIBSON. I am well acquainted with the state of affairs which prevailed in Logan County during that time and with the forces or so-called forces that were engaged there. At the time the report speaks of there were no confederate forces in Logan County, nor was there any West Virginia militia there.

There was a sort of border warfare being carried on, not between recognized forces on either side, but between a set of men among whom the name of Kirk is very prominent, as well as that of Hatfield on the other side, carried on by these men, plundering both sides, irrespective of their predilections. It was not a warfare carried on for plundering alone, but for the purpose of executing special vengeance which they had on each other.

I would like to hear something about the organization of this force. I would like to see who the commander of that force was. I would like to know how this man came to be a soldier in the West Virginia militia, he being a citizen of Martin County, Kentucky, marching from Martin County, Kentucky, to Logan County, West Virginia.

Gentlemen ought to remember, or rather they ought to know, the state of affairs in that country before they undertake to pension men who were not in the regular service on the one side or the other, but were mere plunderers.

Now, I have no objection to giving a pension to any honest regular soldier. I believe in the Government pensioning those who stood by it. I believe that those who were disabled in the service of the Government should be sustained by it. But, sir, I do not believe that the regular soldier on either side should be dragged down and put upon the same level with bushwhackers and guerrillas during the war, or that the latter should receive the same benefits as those who were regularly engaged in the defense of their country.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, what has been said by the gentleman from West Virginia I fully indorse, and if he says he is acquainted with this man Kirk and knows that he was a bushwhacker or guerrilla during the war and not a soldier in any sense of the word, I certainly shall ask that this case shall be passed over until the gentleman who introduced the bill [Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky] can be heard on the question——

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Kentucky is here.

Mr. MATSON. Or until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE] who reported the bill is present and can be heard on the subject. As the statement has been substantially made by the gentleman from West Virginia, I ask that this case be passed over informally for the present.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish to be understood——

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. I know this gentleman, Mr. Kirk, and there is not a better citizen or a better man than he is. What he did during the war I do not know. I presume, however, that the evidence before the committee was sufficient, but I do not know about that. I vouch for Mr. Kirk's being an upright man and good citizen.

Mr. GIBSON. I did not mean, sir, to be understood as saying that I knew Mr. Kirk, the party in this case, nor did I mean to be understood as saying I knew anything in relation to this matter. I was speaking of the state of affairs in that country at that time.

I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, that there was no such regiment as the Sixty-seventh West Virginia Militia. She had no such number of regiments in the service in 1862. The fact is, I doubt whether there was then a regular organized government of West Virginia. The government of West Virginia was not organized until near about that time, some time late in 1861, and she never had sixty-seven regiments of militia. She never had any such militia engaged in warfare in the county of Logan.

I referred to the name of Kirk as a man known in that sort of warfare there, together with that of others who were considered to be on our side; and I say neither on one side nor the other are these men entitled to be recognized as regular soldiers by being pensioned.

But outside of that, this man was not injured in any engagement during the war. The papers do not show that he ever met an enemy, or that he was on the way to meet an enemy. They show that he was accidentally wounded after going into Logan County.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. On which side were they?

Mr. GIBSON. They were against the side which had the most goods to be taken from them. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it in order to move this bill be reported back to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has asked unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally until it can be looked into, and the Chair hears no objection to that course, and it is ordered accordingly.

PENSIONERS ENROLLED BY SPECIAL ACTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1981) for the relief of certain pensioners enrolled by special acts of Congress.

Mr. MATSON. That bill is on this Calendar by mistake, and I move it be passed over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CORYDON MILLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6505) granting a pension to Corydon Millard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Corydon Millard, formerly a chaplain in the United States heavy artillery, at the rate of $— per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6505) granting a pension to Corydon Millard, having had the same under consideration, hereby submit the following report:

The claimant, Corydon Millard, enlisted and acted as chaplain of the Fourth United States Heavy Artillery Volunteers from 1861 to 1866, when he was honorably discharged. He was in active service about four years.

He had a broken leg when he enlisted—that is, his leg had been broken—and he had so far recovered that he appeared to be entirely well, but his application for enlistment was held in abeyance on that account for about two weeks before he was accepted. At various times during his service he suffered from lameness and severe pains in the broken limb, resulting several times in running sores and great prostration, on account of long-continued and severe exertion and exposure. These conditions grew upon him until his disability was quite marked, and of an aggravated character at the time of his discharge. This disability has never left him, and he is now greatly if not totally disabled. He is 65 years of age, entirely without means of support, and unable to earn his living by manual labor.

The Pension Office can not grant him a pension, on account of his prior unsoundness, and therefore he asks relief by special act of Congress.

While his disability had its origin in the injury received before his enlistment, we are of the opinion that his four years of constant service, with the consequent exposure and hardships, must have added greatly to his disability.

Wherefore your committee recommend the passage of said bill, provided, however, that the same be amended by inserting therein the words "twenty dollars," after the word "of," in line 6 thereof.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. The proposition here is to give a pension to a gentleman who has never received any injury while in the service of the Government, and the report of the committee does not show that he ever did. He was injured before he went into the service. I hate to oppose a minister of the gospel—we need their service very much; but I am compelled to oppose it. It is wrong, and I hope this House will not consent to pass it.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not insist upon his objection. As I understand the report it was the opinion of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that this gentleman had so far recovered from the injury to his limb that the officers of the Government who examined him with a view to ascertain his physical ability to perform military service saw fit to permit him to enter the service in that capacity. His services were accepted then, and he served for four years. The report shows that his services were worthy and that he was exposed to hardships for that term.

I hope, therefore, my friend from Virginia will not raise an objection against the passage of the bill, because it seems to me the committee, in view of the facts stated, are fully justified in bringing in the bill in the form in which it is presented to the House for action.

Mr. MATSON. There is an additional reason that should be stated. While it is true that this man had his limb broken before he enlisted, there was no attempt on his part to conceal that defect; but, on the contrary, the question of his enlistment was held in abeyance by the medical officers of the Government for several weeks to determine whether he could be accepted or not. There was, therefore, no fraud on his part. The testimony as to his disability seems to be undisputed. After the medical officers of the Government had examined the man and found him capacitated for service, although it is true that the injury he had received was before his enlistment, still the testimony shows that his injury was greatly aggravated by his service afterward, and it seems to me that the case presents a very strong one.

I see, however, that this report proposes an amendment to the bill to be inserted fixing the amount of the pension to be paid to him. I think that is not right. I think he ought to be pensioned subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, but the amount should not be fixed, so that he may be pensioned under the law as others of his rank and grade are pensioned. That seems to have been an amendment suggested by the gentleman who made the report. I see no reason why that should be done. But I think in other respects the case is pretty well shown to be a meritorious one. Taken in connection with the fact that there was such a thorough examination and such a deliberate acceptance of the man's services on the part of the Government, I think it proper that the pension should be granted.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. It seems to me from the reading of the report that the Government ought not to have accepted this man at all, and that they did not want to accept his services. I think he urged himself upon the acceptance of the Government, because there was a long delay after his application before he was accepted, and the cause of that hesitation was the inability of the man arising from the injury received by him before he applied to enter the service of the Government. Now, the gentleman from Iowa speaks of the fact that he was in the service of the Government for four years. Why it does not appear from this report, and I take it for granted that it presents the strongest facts in his favor, that he ever was in any battle at all.

Mr. MATSON. The report says that he was in active service.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Yes, but not in any battle, and I do not take it for granted that he was in any, for the report would have shown that as a substantive fact in his behalf. I know that he was in the peace business, and take it for granted that he did not fight in any battle.

The truth is, he wanted the situation during the war, and wanted it for the pay attached to it, and the Government accepted him notwithstanding his disability, and he was paid during the whole period, the whole four years that he was in the service.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the propriety of passing this bill over by unanimous consent, leaving it to retain its place upon the Calendar. It is very evident that we can not pass it through the House this evening, and any attempt to do so would result in delay.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa to pass this bill over informally, retaining its place upon the Calendar?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS UNDER SPECIAL ACTS.

Mr. HOLMES. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that House bill 1981, for the relief of certain pensioners enrolled by special acts of Congress, has been omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the bill was called up and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] stated that it was a general bill and improperly on this Calendar.

Mr. HOLMES. I think not, and I would raise the question of order. This bill, as I understand it, was referred by the Speaker of the House to the Private Calendar. It is a bill referring to a certain class of claims for pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any pensioner of the United States receiving a pension by virtue of any special act of Congress, on account of disability incurred by him while in the military or naval service of the United States, shall be entitled to increase of such pension upon the same conditions of rerating and continuance of such increase which are applicable to other pensioners under the general pension laws.

Mr. HOLMES. Now let the report be read.

Mr. MORRILL. That is not a private bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause to be read the order under which the House meets on Friday evenings.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is on the Private Calendar and reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions; that it was referred by the Speaker of the House to the Private Calendar, and by that order appears in its proper place on that Calendar. It seems to me to be clearly within the purview of the committee under the order just read, and a proper bill to be acted upon aside from the fact that it is now on the Calendar and governed by the order to which I have referred.

Mr. MATSON. When I suggested to the Chair that this bill had been improperly referred I did not say, nor did I believe then, that the bill might not be considered by the House; because I think under the order just read, and under which we are operating, that that bill could be considered, because it is on the Private Calendar and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But I do think that it would be utterly unwise and futile to attempt to consider it here to-night without a quorum, because it involves a general principle of legislation; it would lead to considerable discussion in the House, and undoubtedly the point of order that no quorum is present would be made against its passage. I ask, therefore, that it be passed over.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, before that order is made I desire to say this: I am somewhat surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions which has reported this bill to the House should object now to its consideration. It was considered by that committee as an eminently proper and just bill to report to the House. I should certainly desire to hear the opinion of the Committee of the Whole upon it before I consent to its being passed over at this time. I should like to have the report read and see whether there is objection to the bill on the part of any gentleman. I do not think that it should be passed over, because it certainly comes within the purview of the business of this evening session.

Mr. MATSON. In reply to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES] has said in regard to my action in this matter, I desire to say that so far as I am concerned I should not object to the consideration of this bill at any time. But I have an idea that this House, even those members that are absent, ought to be fairly treated in relation to the business which is transacted here on Friday nights. Everybody understands that only private bills are to be considered at our Friday night sessions; and if I was compelled to object myself, I should object to the consideration of this bill at this time in the interest of fair play and fair dealing to other members of the House, because it is well understood by everybody that only private bills are to be considered. Therefore, I feel I should be called upon to object myself, if no one else objected to the consideration of a general proposition of law, to a bill to change the general law at one of our Friday night sessions. That is the reason why I ask that this matter be passed over informally.

Mr. HOLMES. If the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions objects let the bill go over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state when the bill was called the order was made that it be passed over informally. The Chair does not undertake to decide the character of the bill, because it is on the Private Calendar and is read in its regular order. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand the bill goes over, not losing its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill retains its place on the Calendar.

GEORGE W. RUGG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5630) granting a pension to George W. Rugg.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Rugg, late of Company M, Fifth New York Cavalry.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5630) granting a pension to George W. Rugg, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

Soldier enlisted October 18, 1861, and served as a private in Company M, Fifth New York Cavalry, until discharged, January 17, 1865.

Declaration for pension was filed May 17, 1877, and alleges that at Warrenton Junction, Virginia, he received a gunshot wound of the right arm, September 26, 1862, also contracted rheumatism and chronic diarrhea while a prisoner of war at Andersonville.

In an affidavit filed September 22, 1877, he states that he was wounded in the right arm September 9, 1863, at the battle of the Rappahannock, and the wound was dressed by a rebel doctor at Fredericksburg, and the diseases for which he claims pension were contracted while a prisoner of war, and that he is disabled by varicose veins and chronic diarrhea.

His claim was rejected January 23, 1878, upon the ground of inability to furnish any testimony showing the origin of the alleged varicose veins and chronic diarrhea in the service and line of duty.

The prisoner-of-war records show claimant captured at Morrisville, Va., September 13, 1863; paroled at Savannah, Ga., November 21, 1864; furloughed from Camp Parole, Missouri, December 4, 1864, for thirty days. No later record. About fourteen months in rebel prisons.

Claimant in an affidavit filed December 5, 1877, states that it is impossible for him to furnish an affidavit from any of his company, as he has written them, where they used to live, and letters all returned. He has not heard of them since he was taken prisoner in the fall of 1863, excepting three comrades who enlisted at the same time, and they were fellow-prisoners, and all died in Andersonville prison. He states that he was held a prisoner of war fourteen months and nine days, then paroled and sent to parole camp, Annapolis, Md., and his time being out he was sent to New York city, to the Howard Association, and then discharged without being returned to his company, January 17, 1865.

Evidence in the case all tends to show existence of varicose veins and chronic diarrhea since return home in 1865.

The examining surgeon, W. H. Barton, a resident of Fort Howard, Brown County, Wisconsin, reports, August 31, 1877, varicose veins of both legs quite large, and extending from a little above the knees to the feet. He also reports chronic diarrhea. Disability permanent. Varicose veins, one-quarter, $2; chronic diarrhea, one-half, $4; disability, three-quarters, $6.

Your committee believe the case a just one and report in favor of the bill, recommending its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN R. HURLBURT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1653) granting a pension to John R. Hurlburt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pensien laws, the name of John R. Hurlburt, late a private in Company G, Twenty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, and Company G, Fourteenth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1653) granting a pension to John R. Hurlburt, having had said bill under consideration, submit the following report:

Soldier enlisted August 15, 1862; mustered September 14, 1862, and served as a private in Company G, Twenty-fifth Wisconsin Volunteers, till discharged, June 26, 1865.

Declaration for pension was filed January 27, 1874, alleging disability from chronic diarrhea, contracted July 15, 1863, at Snider's Bluff, Mississippi, and partial paralysis following, or resulting from same, while in hospital at Memphis, Tenn.

Claim was rejected February 21, 1881, upon the ground that claimant is not disabled by chronic diarrhea since discharged, and that paralysis can not be accepted as a result of diarrhea.

Dr. John Ehing, a resident of Alma, Buffalo County, Wisconsin, says he has attended claimant's family as physician since October, 1858, and knows that prior to enlistment he was of good health and sound body. Claimant came home sick on furlough in November, 1863, and remained till February, 1864, and during said period was under affiant's treatment for inflammation of lungs, diarrhea, &c. Also, claimant has been under deponent's medical treatment since June, 1865, when discharged. Right side lamed and unable to use right arm for manual labor. (Affidavit filed May 26, 1874.)

Louis P. Hunner, postmaster at Alma, Wis., and H. D. Englesby, in affidavit, filed February 15, 1881, testify to disability from effects of chronic diarrhea since June, 1865.

J. W. De Graff, comrade, corroborates claimant as to time and place of contracting diarrhea, and since discharge unable to perform a day's labor, and that he is in feeble health. (Affidavit filed February 15, 1881.)

Drs. Newton McVey and John Ehing, in affidavits filed November 28, 1881, say they that day examined claimant and found him a great sufferer from chronic dysentery and paralysis; they also judge him as unable to perform manual labor. These doctors reside in Alma, Buffalo County, Wisconsin.

Surgeon-General's record shows claimant was admitted to hospital "R. C. Wood," September 30, 1863, from Helena Ark., for treatment for chronic diarrhea, and was transferred to Memphis, Tenn., October 1, 1863: was admitted to Gayoso general hospital October 2, 1863, with chronic diarrhea, and was transferred October 3, 1863; was admitted to general hospital, Benton Barracks, Missouri, October 7, 1863, with chronic diarrhea; furloughed (thirty days) October 30, or November 1, 1863; returned February 5, 1864; disposition not given. [NOTICE.—Dr. Ehing has testified to treatment during all of said furlough.] Was admitted to Lawsen general hospital, Saint Louis, Mo., February 5, 1864, with anæmia (bloodlessness) and was transferred to Alexandria Barracks, March 4, 1864. The records of Helena, Ark., July 1 to September 30, 1863, and of Alexandria Barracks, Saint Louis, Mo., subsequent to March 4, 1864, furnish no information in the case.

This man is now over 60 years of age, suffering from a disability (for which he has tried to get a pension) since discharge. He served nearly three years faithfully, except when undergoing treatment in the different hospitals named.

Your committee find the evidence greatly in claimant's favor since discharge, and therefore recommend the passage of said bill; pension to date from and after the passage of said bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN A. VANCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Ellen A. Vance.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen A. Vance, invalid daughter of Col. Joseph W. Vance, deceased, late colonel of the Ninety-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert "eighteen;" so that it will read: "At the rate of $18 per month."

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 5812, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Ellen A. Vance is the daughter of Joseph W. Vance, who served during the late war as colonel of the Ninety-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, until killed in action at Sabine Cross-Roads, Louisiana, April 8, 1864. He left surviving him a widow and two daughters; the latter over 16 years of age. The widow remained a pensioner until her death, which occurred a few years ago. The family was left in straitened circumstances, and upon the death of the widow the daughters, both unmarried, were left without means of support. Ellen A. Vance was in her childhood paralyzed throughout the entire left side, and is not only wholly unable to support herself by labor of any kind, but is as helpless as a child.

Having by the death of the father, in defense of his country, been deprived of the support which she so much needs by reason of her infirmities, the committee are of opinion that the relief asked for by the claimant should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "thirty," in line 8, and insert therein instead the word "eighteen."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7302) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Elizabeth Smith, foster-mother of Albert Shafer, late a private in Company B, Thirteenth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1188) for the relief of Charles Smith and Elizabeth Smith, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Charles Smith and Elizabeth Smith are the foster parents of Albert Shaffer, who served as private in Company B, Thirteenth Ohio Cavalry, and while in said service lost a leg in action at Poplar Grove Church, Virginia, for which injury he was pensioned, and from the effects of which he died January 8, 1870. Albert Shaffer was adopted by said Charles and Elizabeth Smith when but 22 months of age, and was clothed and educated by the latter until he entered the service of the United States.

The foster parents in their declining years were much dependent upon their adopted son, who in his last will fully recognized his obligations to them. Charles Smith and Elizabeth Smith at time of the death of Shaffer were possessed of a small home, on which thereafter they were dependent for support.

Since the introduction of the bill under consideration Charles Smith has died, leaving his wife, Elizabeth Smith, with no means of support except the property referred to, upon which there is an indebtedness of $1,300, an amount greater than its actual value. The sale of this property will leave Elizabeth Smith penniless, and, being aged and unable to obtain subsistence by manual labor, she will suffer unless relief is granted her.

The committee are of opinion that, inasmuch as she has given to the country a son, although adopted, upon whom she could have looked for support in her old days, the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore submit the accompanying substitute bill (H. R. 7302) and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA O. ZEIGLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4878) granting a pension to Emma O. Zeigler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma O. Zeigler, widow of W. A. Zeigler, late captain of Company —, First Regiment West Virginia Infantry Veteran Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4878) granting a pension to Emma O. Zeigler, respectfully report:

That claimant is the widow of William A. Zeigler, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, First West Virginia Light Artillery Volunteers, August 5, 1861; was commissioned second lieutenant in Company I, Fifth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers, January 13, 1863; first lieutenant, West Virginia Veteran Infantry Volunteers, September 5, 1864; and captain March 29, 1865, and was honorably discharged July 21, 1865.

September 20, 1869, soldier filed a declaration for pension, alleging that on or about August 5, 1864, near Middleburg, Md., while retreating from the enemy, and in comand of Company I, Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, he received sunstroke.

April 20, 1876, the soldier died, pending the final adjudication of his claim. After the death of the soldier, Emma O. Zeigler, the widow, completed the claim, and was granted a pension up to the date of her husband's death. But her claim for pension as the widow of said soldier was rejected on the ground that the fatal disease of which the soldier died was not due to, and was not a result of, his military service.

Surgeon Hysell, of the Ninth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers, testifies, November 3, 1879:

"That he frequently prescribed for the soldier in the summer of 1864 for hemorrhoids, or piles, and chronic diarrhea, and as surgeon of the First West Virginia Volunteers he prescribed for the said officer on several different occasions during the winter of 1864 and 1865 for the same trouble, together with ulceration of the rectum; that after both officers were discharged from its service in 1865 they settled about ten miles apart, affiant at Wyandotte, W. Va., and the officer at Catlettsburg, Ky.; and that he frequently saw and prescribed for the said Zeigler during the following winter and the summer of 1866 for what he called his old trouble, and the officer appeared to be suffering with the same disease for which he had treated him while in the service."

A. Robb, M. D., testifies, May 27, 1876:

"That he attended soldier in his last illness; had been his family physician for three years; he died April 20, 1876, of what he supposed was hemorrhoids, or piles, but shown by post mortem examination to be cancer of rectum, involving lower part of spinal cord, sciatic nerve of left side, and the bladder; that he treated soldier March 17, 1876, for what he considered piles; soldier died April 20, 1876; a post mortem examination, made eight hours after death, showed the disease to be of a cancerous nature."

Captain Ewing swears to an intimate acquaintance with the soldier from 1865 to 1870; they occupied the same room as an office from 1865 to 1870, and knows soldier was frequently complaining of piles and under treatment for the same by Dr. Pugh, who was a physician boarding in the soldier's father's family; affiant filed soldier's application for pension and did not allege piles, because Dr. Pugh was dead and they could not prove medical treatment.

Alcinous Carnahan swears he was ward master in the regimental hospital of the Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, and had a personal knowledge of the fact that Lieutenant Zeigler was afflicted while in the service with piles, and that from 1865 to 1870 soldier complained of piles.

Colonel Enochs, of soldier's regiment, swears that soldier was treated for piles in 1864, during the summer campaign in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, and from that time on to the date of his discharge in 1865.

James C. Ely testifies that he is a druggist in the town of Catlettsburg, Ky., and sold medicines to the soldier frequently during the year 1865, and on to 1870, which he desired for piles.

This case was investigated by a special examiner of the Pension Office in 1882, and the testimony thus taken is very voluminous and conflicting. In submitting the evidence in the case the special examiner says:

"I also believe that William A. Ziegler contracted piles in service, and that they continued to slightly affect him up to death."

It is shown by the evidence that the widow has not remarried and that the soldier abandoned her a few years before his death, being at the time in fear of arrest for having used money belonging to an insurance company. The soldier located at Blanchester, Ohio, where he assumed the name of Avery, and July 19, 1871, was married to Miss Alice Jerral, with whom he lived until the date of his death, April 20, 1876; and that ten children were the result of this marriage. During the time he was living with this woman at Blanchester, Ohio, he kept up a correspondence with and sent small sums of money to his lawful wife at the town of Catlettsburg, Ky., in which he impressed her he could not return home by reason of his liability to arrest for the use of money belonging to the insurance company as aforesaid. It is shown conclusively that no divorce proceedings were ever had by the soldier or claimant, and the legal marriage of claimant is fully established.

Your committee find from the evidence in the case that the soldier's death was due to the disability contracted in the military service, and that his legal widow, which is the claimant in this case, is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to make a statement to the House in relation to this claim, some of the facts in connection with which are known to myself. In the first place, the report sets forth that the claim for pension was filed on account of a sunstroke received in Maryland. It appears that this soldier had never made a claim on account of any other disability up to that time; and no other disability was discovered by this soldier, so far as we are informed, for a considerable time afterward. He gives as his excuse for not stating in his declaration that he suffered from piles that he could not find the regimental physician. The regimental physician, Dr. Hysell, lived at Wyandotte, three miles from where I live, and this soldier lived at Catlettsburg, seven or eight miles from where I live. There was daily steamboat communication between those towns, and this soldier could have no difficulty at any time in finding Dr. Hysell, for he remained there all the time from the war till a few years ago, when he himself went to Ohio.

But I wish to call the attention of the committee to a further fact. The evidence shows that whatever may have been the treatment given by the physicians to this man, either during the war or afterward, he did not die of piles, but died from a cancer—an internal cancer. This was shown by the post mortem examination. Now, I state here that the family of this man are subject to cancer; a few years after this man's death his father died of cancer. So that this was a family taint, and not a disease arising from any service during the war.

Furthermore, the report shows that Mr. Zeigler himself was not entitled to credit in any reports he may have made. A fugitive from justice, afraid to return to his own section of country, where he had deserted his wife, he is not entitled here to any credit for his statements. I do not think this is a case which the Government of the United States ought to shoulder. I do not believe this soldier is entitled to any consideration. I am satisfied that if gentlemen knew the records they would discover he had never performed for the Government any service entitling him or his family to a pension.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill at the instance of our present Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Leedom, who, I regret to say, is not here to-night. The bill is similar to one introduced by him when a member of this House. He knows these parties personally, and says that this is beyond question a meritorious case. He knows this lady, who I believe now resides in his town, in the State of Ohio. I have understood from him that the merit of this case, so far as this widow is concerned, is unquestioned; that she is a woman of good character, respectable in every way.

Now, I have some knowledge of the effects of chronic diarrhea contracted in the military service; and I know that death has very often resulted from disease of the character described in this report. I believe this to be a meritorious case, and I hope my friend from West Virginia will withdraw his objection to the bill.

I regret exceedingly that Mr. Leedom, who suffered an injury yesterday, is not here to-night, and that I can not obtain further information from him.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as making any reflections upon the lady to whom it is proposed to grant this pension. She herself may be most meritorious; but it is perfectly immaterial how good or how bad a woman she may be. She comes here basing her claims for a pension upon injuries and disease on the part of her husband, originating, as it is claimed, during his service for the Government. Now, I say this report fails to show any services upon his part; it does not show that he received any injury during such service. Indeed, it shows that he never received any injuries at all. There is not merely negative but affirmative evidence that he never received any injury during his term of service.

If this soldier suffered from the causes for which we now undertake to pension him; if he suffered from the disease for which it is claimed he was under treatment, why did he not so represent in his claim? Why did he undertake to say that he was entitled to a pension because he suffered a sunstroke in Maryland, if there were these other positive matters upon which his claim could have been based? There is no attempt now to prove sunstroke. There is nothing about sunstroke in the evidence. The claim is based upon the allegation that he died from the piles, which, however, the post mortem examination shows to have been cancer. I state to this committee that the father of this man died from cancer. There was a family taint of that description.

I am compelled to oppose the granting of this claim, because if we pile up unworthy claims and give them favorable consideration they are just so many bars in the way of worthy people who need pensions and ought to have them. I say let us pension worthy claimants, but let us keep out unworthy ones.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that this bill be set aside informally.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the gentleman from West Virginia would read this report carefully he would arrive at the conclusion that while this man died of cancer, it was superinduced by disease which originated in the service. The evidence of the surgeon of his regiment shows that he treated him while in the service for hemorrhoids; and the only physician who speaks of cancer states the fact that the post mortem examination showed the man had cancer, involving the lower part of the spinal cord and the lower bowels. Certainly it is not a far-fetched conclusion, even on the part of one who is not a physician, that this cancerous affection must have been superinduced by disease contracted during this man's service—that it was not a constitutional and original disease. It was in this view that the committee found his death was attributable to disease incurred in the service. While I have no doubt of the fact, as stated by the gentleman from West Virginia, that this man's father died of cancer, and that there was a predisposition to cancer in the family, yet I think we are entitled to conclude from the evidence that cancer in this case was superinduced by disease contracted in the service. Hence I believe the finding ought to be in favor of the widow.

Now, as to the soldier himself, it is shown by this report that he enlisted in August, 1861, as a private in Company B, First West Virginia Artillery Volunteers; that he was commissioned as second lieutenant in the Fifth West Virginia Volunteers in January, 1863; as first lieutenant in West Virginia Veteran Infantry Volunteers September 5, 1864; and as captain March 29, 1865; and that he was honorably discharged July 21, 1865. So he seems to have rendered some service.

It is true that it is shown after his service he became a defaulter in an insurance or other company and failed to provide for his wife a little while before his death. The fact that she is his legal widow is undisputed.

Besides, since the gentleman from West Virginia made his statement I now remember that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House has commended the bill to me repeatedly and spoken of its great merits. It seems to me that it is not a bad case by any means, but on the contrary is a clear case of merit.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I have personal knowledge of the service of that Fifth West Virginia Regiment. No regiment raised there performed harder service than that regiment. I know personally and intimately some of the gentlemen who testify in behalf of this soldier. They are gentlemen of the highest respectability. I hope my friend from West Virginia will withdraw his opposition and let the bill be passed.

Mr. GIBSON. I shall object to the consideration of that bill. I know these parties myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for a division. I hope the bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. MATSON. I ask by unanimous consent that be done.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to read the evidence, and if I am satisfied I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. MATSON. That is a fair proposition, and I cheerfully accept it.

By unanimous consent, the bill was passed over informally.

Mr. STRUBLE. I suggest that the reports of committees be not read unless asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not necessary, as the reports are only read when the reading is asked for. They are not necessarily a part of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I shall ask that they be read. I do not propose to act on bills without information.

The CHAIRMAN. Any gentleman on the floor has the right to demand the reading of a report in the nature of an argument. It has been so held by the Chair repeatedly.

HENRY MILKEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5378) granting a pension to Henry Milkey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Milkey, late a private in Company I, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5378) granting a pension to Henry Milkey, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Henry Milkey was enrolled on the 24th of February, 1865, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in Company I, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; was mustered out of the service January 20, 1866, at Macon, Ga.

This case was rejected by the Pension Department because of the alleged inability to establish the existence of the disability of the claimant during service or until after the date of his discharge from the Army.

This case has been carefully examined; the claimant is totally blind, and has been for years. He says he contracted an affection of the eyes while in the Army, caused by exposure and hardship near Dalton, Ga., in the early part of the summer of 1865, and says he was treated by the surgeon of his regiment, but did not go to the hospital for fear of being detained there; he asked the surgeon to excuse him from duty, which he did.

Philip Runy, of Dayton, Ohio, February 25, 1881, swears that "the claimant was strong, with nothing the matter with his eyes previous to entering the service."

Angelus Wertzel, Joseph Mohr, and Peter Sautel, all members of his company and regiment, swear that—

"Henry Milkey was taken sick some time in March, 1865, near Nashville, Tenn., which sickness resulted in disease of the eyes."

In a subsequent affidavit made by Philip Runy to the one already referred to he testifies that—

"The claimant has been suffering with disease of eyes since his return from the Army, and has gradually lost his sight."

William T. Herman, on November 26, 1881, swears as follows:

"I am well acquainted with Henry Milkey, and, to the best of my knowledge and belief, he was a sound and healthy man at the time of and before his enlistment, and contracted the disease of eyes, resulting in total blindness, while in the service of the United States and in the line of his duty."

Henry Fisher, of Dayton, Ohio, on the 28th day of November, 1881, testifies as follows:

"I was a member of Company I, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was well acquainted with Henry Milkey, and have been for over twenty years. He was a sound and healthy man before entering the service, and never had any disease of the eyes. It is my firm belief that the disability of Henry Milkey, which has resulted in total blindness, was the result of exposure and fatigue while in the United States service as a soldier."

Perhaps the most important testimony in favor of the claimant is that of William Egry, a reputable and skillful physician of Dayton, Montgomery County, Ohio. On the 23d day of March, 1880, he swore as follows:

"I have been the family physician of Henry Milkey, and have known him from childhood. He was always healthy prior to his enlistment, on the 24th day of February, 1865. He received his discharge from the service in 1866, since which time I have attended him frequently for attacks of hyperæmia of the brain, in consequence of which there has been progressive amaurosis of both optic nerves, resulting in total blindness."

Subsequently, in answer to a letter from the Pension Department, addressed to him, Dr. Egry writes as follows:

"In February, 1866, I was called to attend the claimant, finding him suffering with hyperæmia of the brain. I administered leeches on his forehead and temples, ice applications on his head, and antiphlogistic and derivating treatment internally. He became better and was able to be about, but was growing blind. Atrophia of the optic nerve was predominating and increasing. Every summer he suffered with a relapse of hyperæmia of the brain, and was for most of the time under my treatment. In the year 1873 I went to Europe, and consequently lost sight of him for seventeen months, and during this time total blindness ensued, and he has been blind ever since, being led by his children."

While the claimant when in the service struggled against going into the hospital, and consequently has no hospital record, so as to furnish the proof to the Pension Department that he was afflicted while in the service with the disease which has destroyed his sight, the testimony is abundant and convincing that he was well before entering the service, and has been gradually getting blind from the time of leaving the service until he was stricken with total loss of sight.

In the judgment of your committee, this man's affliction was produced by the trials and exposures of the service and while in the line of duty, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES HENDRIX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1219) granting a pension to Charles Hendrix.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Hendrix, late a private in Company H, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteers, and Company B, same regiment; said restoration to commence from the date when his name was dropped from said pension-roll.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I do not call for the reading of the report. I have it here.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTIAN BAUMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6357) granting a pension to Christian Bauman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christian Bauman, late a private in Company A, Fifty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID URBANSKY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4569) granting a pension to David Urbansky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Urbansky, late a private in Company B, Fifty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER FALKNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6197) granting a pension to Peter Falkner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter Falkner, late a member of Company C, also of Company D, United States Engineer Battalion.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE LEWIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6663) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Caroline Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Caroline Lewis, widow of John Lewis, late of the United States colored troops (certificate No. 140665), who was killed near Louisville, Ky., about the 6th day of November, 1864, in the line of duty.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Read the report.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6663) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Caroline Lewis, submit the following report:

Caroline Lewis is beyond doubt the widow of John Lewis, late of United States colored troops, who was killed near Louisville, Ky., about November 6, 1864, in the line of duty. As his widow she was placed on the pension-roll from July 25, 1866, until October 31, 1877, when she was dropped, on the ground that she was not the widow of the soldier.

The ground of this action was the report of a man named Fields, whose statement was certainly false and probably malicious. The woman is the widow of John Lewis. She proves this fully by B. L. Brooks, the preacher who married her to Lewis, whose affidavit, dated December 22, 1879, is full and circumstantial, and is filed with the papers. She never ought to have been stricken from the rolls, and ought to be restored now. We recommend passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

J. F. JUSTICE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5103) granting a pension to J. F. Justice.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place the name of J. F. Justice, late a private in Company —, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry (pension claim No. 317395), on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5103) granting a pension to J. F. Justice, submit the following report:

Joshua F. Justice was duly enlisted October 1, 1863, as a corporal in Company H, Second Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry, and discharged August 16, 1865.

The soldier has affidavit of Capt. Levi Jones and others that he was a sound man at the time of enlistment. This is made satisfactory to the committee. He has the evidence of Capt. Levi Jones, and James N. Davis, and Dr. A. B. Sams, with that of comrades, which establishes that he was afflicted during his service in the back, kidneys, and hips, and was sent to hospital at Tazewell. The only ground of rejection was that he had not produced medical certificate. His doctor had forgotten his disease.

The committee think that this is a case justifying Congressional relief, and recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment, inserting in line 4 the letter "H," and in line 5 strike out "third" and insert "second."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move instead of "J." to insert "Joshua," as that seems to be the name of the party.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4556) granting a pension to Joseph Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Joseph Williams, late a private in Batteries K and F, Second United States Artillery, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4556) granting a pension to Joseph Williams, submit the following report:

Joseph Williams enlisted in Company K, Second United States Artillery, and served until discharged by reason of re-enlistment, February 22, 1864; was transferred to Company F from Company K in 1865; discharged at Fort Vancouver 22d February, 1867, on account of expiration of service; re-enlisted at same place in the same battery February 26, 1867; was discharged February 26, 1870; re-enlisted in same battery at Presidio, Cal., July 1, 1871, and discharged at Marion, N. C., the 1st November, 1874.

Surgeon-General's report shows that soldier was admitted to post hospital, Fort Pickens, Fla., and treated for "contusion;" treated for "diarrhea" June, 1861; admitted to post hospital, Benicia Barracks, Cal., November 18, 1865, and treated for "contusion."

The soldier makes oath that he was sick in hospital at Plattsburg Barracks with chills and fever, and that on the route from New York to Florida he was hurt by the crushing in of the bulwarks of the transport Illinois; that he was hurt in the face by the pole of a limber, cutting through his under lip, breaking some of the front teeth, and driving one into the jaw, where it remains yet, producing a festering sore in the jaw; was sick with fever at Federal Hill, Baltimore; was kicked by one of the battery horses at Benicia, Cal., being struck on head and chest, and was treated in hospital; was wrecked on bark Torrent in Cook's Inlet, Alaska Territory, in 1865, and the right forearm broken; also suffered from piles, rheumatism, pains in the legs and back; also suffered at Presidio Barracks from disease of the liver and kidneys. Comrades of the soldier swear that he was sick with disease of liver and kidneys at Presidio Barracks, which they state of their own personal knowledge.

Dr. Gilkey, examining surgeon at Marion, N. C., for the United States, says: "Claimant states that he has pain on pressure over the region of the liver, right shoulder, and over the region of the kidneys, with a desire to micturate very frequently when exerting himself, indicating chronic nephritis and chronic hepatitis. I find considerable injury to the teeth and alviolar process in both upper and lower maxillary bones, caused, as claimant says, by being struck with the pole of the limber. Claimant is anæmic, emaciated, very feeble, and general health broken down. Disability from nephritis, hepatitis, and injury to face, one-fourth each, aggregating three-fourths."

The committee think the soldier's long service, his many attacks and injuries, and his diseases and feeble condition at time of discharge and now, entitle him to a pension, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARION D. EGBERT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Marion D. Egbert.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marion D. Egbert, late of Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, for pension.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Marion D. Egbert, submit the following report:

Marion D. Egbert was a corporal in Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and in service in September, 1863, at Cumberland Gap. He was detailed to act as ordnance sergeant. One day in the latter part of November, 1863, while he and the men working under his orders were sunning the ammunition in the magazine, a comrade lit a portfire, which communicated with damp powder on the ground, and would in a moment have produced a fatal explosion of a large amount of cannon ammunition. Egbert, seeing the danger, and that he could not flee from the explosion, threw himself across the line of burning powder and broke the trail, thus preventing the explosion. The fire burnt his blouse and pants quite severely, and the fright, shock, and fire produced a partial deafness, loss of sight, and paralysis in the left side.

The Pension Office required proof of the soldier's condition from a surgeon and two comrades. These Egbert frankly states he can not furnish, because, as the ill effects of the fright and burning did not culminate at once, he was not treated in hospital, and because those present when the accident occurred were men detailed from a Tennessee regiment, whose names he did not know and does not now know. But he does prove by a comrade that he saw him a few days after the explosion suffering severely. He proves by many of his acquaintances that he was sound prior to his going into the service, and has not been sound since. He proves a good character as a man, and his physician testifies that he has been attending him off and on since 1864 for partial paralysis of his tongue and left side.

We are satisfied of the merits of this case, although it falls short of the degree and character of testimony required at the Pension Office. We recommend passage of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I remember that case was fully discussed at the last session of Congress; I am sure it was. [Cries of "No!"] Oh, yes; I remember very distinctly. I shall object to that. I do not think that case comes up with any proof at all. The statement on the part of the claimant is that he can not furnish any proof because he can not recollect the names of the comrades with him. There is not a particle of proof but the oath of the applicant—no witness, no comrade, nobody; nothing but the uncorroborated statement of the claimant. If we are going to grant pensions in that way, there is not enough money in the United States to pay the amount we will be called upon to pay. I object to this.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Virginia takes into consideration the corroborating circumstances in connection with this case. True, there is no direct testimony in the case other than that of the applicant himself; but there are circumstances that go to corroborate his testimony. We have, for instance, the evidence, very important to be considered in that connection, of a physician, to the effect that he was sound when he went into the Army. We have also corroborating testimony that he has not been a sound man since, and the further testimony of a comrade who saw him a few days after the occurrence stated in the report and who testifies that he was suffering from severe injuries at the time caused by sacrificing his own personal comfort and safety to prevent a disastrous explosion. All of these tend to corroborate the statement of the applicant himself, and prove by circumstantial testimony that the injury complained of resulted from the explosion at that time.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas I will only say that I notice the statement of this physician does not furnish to us any information at all as to when this unsoundness commenced, none whatever; and it is utterly impossible that such a transaction as is related in that report could have occurred and yet the claimant be without the ability to furnish any testimony in reference to it.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he remembers the statement made there in the report that the men who were with him on that detail were of different regiments, not his own, men with whom he was not familiarly associated and not comrades; consequently their names were not known to him at the time, nor are they known to him now, and as a result he can not obtain their testimony in support of his application.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. In reply I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that it is utterly impossible, no matter what regiment these men belonged to, that this man should have been with them for some time at Cumberland Gap and yet not be able to furnish a scintilla of testimony in support of his application.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be informally passed over, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

THOMAS FERGUSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7303) to restore the name of Thomas Ferguson to the pension-roll.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Ferguson, late a member of Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

That Thomas Ferguson enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 10, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability of paralysis of bladder and chronic diarrhea.

February 12, 1868, he was pensioned at the rate of $6 per month for atrophy of testicle and penis; March 8, 1869, increased to $8, and November 25, 1873, to $18 per month for spinal disease.

December 2, 1878, the name of pensioner was dropped from the roll by order of the Secretary of the Interior, on evidence submitted by a special examiner of the Pension Office that the disability for which claimant was pensioned was due to intemperate habits and not to his military service. The evidence in support of this charge is entirely ex parte, and without notice to claimant.

Dr. E. A. West, of Pleasantville, Pike County, Indiana, testified, September 16, 1879, that he has practiced medicine for five years and has treated claimant for spinal disease, and that he has been a constant sufferer from said disease; that he knows these facts from personal observation.

A. J. Harrington, M. D., of Spurgeon, Pike County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) that for three years after the war claimant was a sober man, as he knows of personal knowledge; that he is now a man of temperate habits, but he is informed was dissipated three or four years ago.

Frederick Gyring, J. M. Fleeneer, Jacob Lyring, Hiram Williams, and Thomas Gourley, all citizens of Pike County, certified to be reputable citizens and witnesses whose statements are entitled to full credit, testify to substantially the same facts as those given by Dr. Harrington.

We have examined all the evidence in this case very carefully, and find the soldier was discharged from the service on account of the disability for which he was pensioned; that the numerous medical examinations by different United States surgeons and boards all agree as to the nature and extent of his disability, and its continuance from the date of incurrence while in the service and in line of duty to the present, and that a clear preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the restoration of the soldier to the pension-roll, and accordingly your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute bill.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I object to that bill. The Secretary of the Interior tells us that the name of this man was dropped from the pension-roll because it had been ascertained by evidence taken by one of the examiners of the Pension Office that his disability had arisen from dissipation, and not from injuries incurred in the line of duty or disease contracted in the service of the Government. The Committee on Invalid Pensions tell us that that was ex parte testimony, and now the case is presented to us for the restoration of his name to the pension-roll upon testimony just as much ex parte as this. The Government was not represented when this testimony was taken, and consequently it is as much ex parte as the testimony upon which the Secretary of the Interior dropped the man's name from the pension-roll.

It seems to me that we have a case here before us in which we are told by one of the highest officers of the Government that the disability of the claimant was contracted on account of dissipation; and I suppose, sir, in a case of this kind that the Government ought to be represented when testimony is taken before we restore this man's name to the pension-roll. Under these circumstances I shall be compelled to object to it.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the strongest features in support of this case is found in the fact that this man was discharged from the service on acount of the very disability for which he was first pensioned; he was first discharged and was afterward pensioned on account of that disability which was incurred in the service. After that, sir, it is not unfair to say whoever stated that this man's disability arose from intemperance must have reported that from what we are bound to assume was a spirit of malice.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Will the gentleman from Indiana point me to the proof of that assertion?

Mr. MATSON. I do not say that there is anything in the report to that effect. But any man who made a statement of that kind against a soldier voluntarily must have acted from malice, particularly when that soldier had been discharged from the service on account of the disability for which he was pensioned.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Why, the Secretary of the Interior thought it was of sufficient force to justify him in striking his name from the pension-roll.

Mr. MATSON. Because the Secretary of the Interior did not hear the soldier's side of the case at all.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. We do not hear the Government's side.

Mr. MATSON. You have here both sides of the case. Here is the report of a special examiner contained within the papers in that case showing the evidence taken by the examiner when the pensioner was not present at all. Then we have his own side of the case; and when into the scale on his side is thrown the fact that he was discharged for the very disease that he was pensioned for, the committee thought itself justified in finding in his favor. The mere statement of one man or two men or any number of men that originated necessarily in malice I do not think ought to deprive the man of his pension; and that it did originate in malice I must believe, because I can not think a man would report a fact against another unless he had some malice at the bottom of it, especially as I have said in a case where a man was discharged from the service for a disability for which he drew the pension.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not true that sometimes reports go into the Pension Office against a soldier who is never permitted to know the person who makes the charge?

Mr. MATSON. I am happy to say to the gentleman that under the present practice of the Pension Office such statements are given no weight whatever, and in every examination resulting on account of such statements information is given to the pensioner as to the time and place of taking testimony upon the subject.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But at the time this man was dropped?

Mr. MATSON. At the time this man was dropped the practice was different. There were secret investigations; there were detectives; and these detectives desired to have business. They sought cases of that kind, and many cases were made that had no foundation in fact; and I think this is one of them. I am satisfied from the mere fact that he was discharged from the service on account of disease contracted in the service and immediately afterward pensioned. I am satisfied from that fact alone this must have been a malicious thing on the part of the person who informed against him.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I will say to my friend from Indiana I will examine this case if he will consent to its being passed over; and if I find the facts to be as he states I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] whether there is anything in existing law to prevent the Secretary of the Interior from restoring this man to the pension-roll if these facts are brought to his knowledge.

Mr. MATSON. I presume there is not.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to make a remark in reference to this case. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] in his objection to this claim appeared to lay great stress on the fact that the Secretary of the Interior had dropped this man from the pension-roll. Now, I beg to remind the gentleman from Virginia of what I understand to be a fact in regard to this business, that very few of these cases come to the personal knowledge of the Secretary of the Interior. The evidence is taken by clerks of the Department, and the order is entered, and the party dropped from the roll; and unless the case is taken to the Secretary on appeal the chance is that he does not personally see one case in a thousand. I think the gentleman should not lay much stress on that fact.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] consents to let this case be passed over.

Mr. LAIRD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. No motion has been made.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally.

THEODORE LEVERON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 301) granting a pension to Theodore Leveron.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Theodore Leveron, late a private in Company M, Third Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 301) granting a pension to Theodore Leveron, respectfully report:

That Theodore Leveron enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company M, Third Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, October 11, 1861, and was honorably discharged August 3, 1865.

May 2, 1874, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging gunshot wound of left arm, received at Hopkinsville, Ky., July 20, 1863; was also thrown from his horse at Cadiz, Ky., in the fall of 1863, causing injuries of the head; which was rejected February 27, 1883, as to gunshot wound, on the ground that soldier was not in line of duty at the time of receiving said injury, and no pensionable disability from injury to head since discharge.

It appears from the evidence in the case that the soldier had an altercation with a citizen at a place of amusement in Hopkinsville, Ky., on or about the 20th day of June, 1863. The next day after this, as soldier was passing the place of business of the citizen, Savage by name, he came out and caught the soldier by the collar, and shot him with a pistol which he held in his right hand. At the time of the shooting soldier was detailed as a messenger at the military telegraph office, and was on his way to his breakfast at the time he was assaulted and shot. The citizen was arrested by the military authorities, but whether he was placed on trial for the offense is not disclosed by the evidence.

Capt. Albert Slov, of Vincennes, Ind., testifies (November 9, 1882) that he was captain of claimant's company in the service, and corroborates the statements of claimant from facts gathered at the time of the shooting, and to seeing the wound after its infliction.

John P. Kullehn, of Wheatland, Knox County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) to the fact that he was a member of claimant's company and regiment, and to the shooting of the soldier by Savage at the time and in manner above detailed; did not see the shooting, but heard of it immediately after its occurrence.

C. P. Hollingsworth, of Bruceville, Knox County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) that he was the first lieutenant of claimant's company, and to the fact of the wounding of the soldier by Savage at Hopkinsville, as indicated by other witnesses; that the shooting was without provocation on the part of claimant; that he believes that said shot was given solely because Leveron was a Federal soldier.

Claimant was on detached duty at the time he was shot, and under regular orders.

We think the evidence in the case justifies the conclusion that the soldier was shot by the citizen, Savage, while in the line of duty, and that the controversy was not provoked or encouraged by the soldier, and that the injury to the claimant is clearly due to his military service, and that he should receive a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. GIBSON. It does seem to me that if we go to pension these Kentucky people when they shoot each other, especially those people about Hopkinsville, we will soon exhaust the Treasury of the United States. The report in this case shows that this soldier left his camp, went to Hopkinsville to a dance or frolic of some sort, and while they were at this frolic he and this man Savage got into a row. They met next day and Savage shot him with a pistol.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Savage went out of his place of business and made an assault on the soldier as he was passing by.

Mr. GIBSON. That is only the style in which they do things there. But this soldier, it will be remembered, returns to his camp; he remains in the service; he is discharged at the expiration of the war; discharged not by reason of any disability that he was suffering under. He continued in the service and never for nine years after the end of the war filed any claim for the pension.

Now, it is well understood that when parties sleep upon their rights an extraordinary length of time that is a circumstance that militates against them in any court. This party if he had been disabled from any cause that entitled him to a pension would not have slept upon his rights until 1874 and then come here. And when he does come here he does not show by the evidence he is suffering from any disability. The evidence merely states that he had a gunshot wound, and does not state that a disability was created. There is no disability proved in this case; it is the case merely of a gunshot wound.

Mr. MATSON. The objection by the gentleman from West Virginia that no disability has been proved I wish to say can be fully answered to his own satisfaction. The bill itself provides that this soldier shall be pensioned, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, which expressly require him to be examined and the extent of disability ascertained before he is pensioned. This disability must be ascertained before he can be put on the pension-roll. There is not anything in the bill that fixes the disability. That objection, therefore, of the gentleman from West Virginia can not obtain.

Mr. GIBSON. But, Mr. Chairman, this soldier has been examined. He has made his case; he made his case before the department and his claim was there rejected. He then comes before Congress and he makes his case before Congress, accumulating all the testimony that he could bring before this body in addition to what he had before the department. Having been repulsed there, knowing it was necessary to obtain further evidence, after two attempts, one before the department and one before Congress, he comes here and neither alleges nor attempts to show any disability. The only thing he attempts to show is that he received a slight wound in the arm from the discharge of a pistol in a private quarrel with a man he had been with on a frolic the night before.

Then the effort is made to show, simply because he had been on a frolic with a man the night before, and this was in the State of Kentucky, therefore the man shot him because he was a Union soldier. Now, I repeat, if this man is not suffering under any disability, why put him upon the pension-rolls at all? If he incurred any disability, why did he not prove it when undertaking to make out his case before the Pension Office?

If we want to bring this whole pension-list into disrepute; if we want to make the whole system of pensioning soldiers a mere farce, enacted by a few men getting together and parceling out so much in the Treasury as can be spared, let us go on in this way; but if not, then when a party comes before Congress asking to be put on the pension-list, let us require him at least to show that he is suffering from some disability received in the service.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very patiently to the gentleman from West Virginia, but still I must insist that it would be very unwise for Congress to undertake to turn itself into a board of surgeons to determine under what disability a man may be laboring. The only thing we can do is to submit such questions to those who are more competent to determine them than we are, to place persons on the pension-list subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, leaving the board of surgeons to determine the question of disability.

Now, as to the merits of this case, it is shown very clearly by the evidence in this report that this man was in the line of duty at the time he was injured. Whether the shot was a friendly one or was from the hands of an enemy does not, I apprehend, make any difference. If this man was guilty of no negligence or wrong, and was in the line of duty at the time he was injured, he should be pensioned. That is a proposition which I think my friend from West Virginia will concede.

It is shown that he was detailed as a messenger at the telegraph office at Hopkinsville, and at the time of receiving the injury was going from his office to his boarding-house to get his breakfast. Certainly he was in the line of duty. Whether the disability is great or small is a question that the board of surgeons will determine if we pass this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. Inasmuch as the department has rejected this claim, I submit it is not asking too much if I propose that it be laid aside without losing its place until we can examine the papers.

Mr. MATSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I am not in the habit of occupying any time at these evening sessions, although I always attend them. I desire, however, to call the attention of my friend from West Virginia to a particular point in this case, because it is one that is constantly recurring. In order that the Pension Office shall grant a pension two things must concur: first, there must be shown a pensionable disability; and, secondly, the pensionable disability must have been incurred in the service and in line of duty. Now, in this particular case there is a question in the gentleman's mind as to the pensionable disability. But that is a thing with which we have nothing to do.

Under the law, in order that the Pension Office shall grant this pension, it must be made to appear by the proofs that a pensionable disability was incurred in the service and in the line of duty. That is a point which the Pension Office can not waive; but that point we can waive. There appears to be some doubt in this case in the minds of some gentlemen whether this disability, such as it is, was incurred in the line of duty—whether it was not the result of something that occurred the night before, when, as my friend from West Virginia says, there was a "frolic." That the man was in the service and in the line of duty at the time the disability was incurred there can be no doubt. Whether his receiving the injury at that time was or was not the result of something preceding which occurred when he was not in the line of duty is a question upon which there may be some doubt.

Now, in passing these special acts, we simply say that the question as to the person being at the time of the injury in the line of duty is a question that we, the Congress of the United States, which made the general law, will waive; that notwithstanding the doubt in this regard we will allow the Secretary of the Interior to place the applicant upon the pension-roll. But the question as to the pensionability of the disability, and the extent of the disability, whether total or partial, or none at all—that is a matter for the Pension Office to consider. By our action here we simply waive on our part the question whether the soldier was in the line of duty, leaving the extent of the disability and the amount of the pension to be determined at the Pension Office under our general laws.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, it has been properly said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that two things must concur in order that the Pension Office may award a pension. The gentleman seems to admit that this case, as stated to us, leaves it a matter of doubt whether the circumstances would justify the rejection of this case by the Pension Department or by Congress. I desire to call attention to the testimony cited in this report—the verdict of the jury that had before them for examination the testimony appearing upon the files—so that we may determine the judgment to be entered in this case by Congress simply as a question of testimony.

Now, here is the evidence of the claimant himself, which I submit to gentlemen, if it is to be rejected must be met by some proof tending to impeach the veracity of the claimant. There is none stated by the gentlemen on their own knowledge; there is none stated from the record—in no instance; while here is the testimony of the two officers of his company, the one swearing directly to the fact to be proven, namely, the receiving of the injury at the time and place where the soldier was in the discharge of his duty. That is the testimony of the first lieutenant; and then we have the captain swearing to the fact of the injury and to the effect produced.

These men swear from knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the transaction gained at the time, but not by sight. Then there is the testimony of a comrade, who swears from actual knowledge acquired at the time. Here are the requirements of the law satisfied. The pension law says they shall have the testimony of one commissioned officer or of two comrades. Here is the testimony of the claimant himself, which we may set aside on the common-law theory he has interest in the recovery, under what is not now recognized by law, but under the savagery of the common law it is set aside and passes for nothing. But what is to be said of the testimony of the two commissioned officers, one from actual knowledge, added to that of the comrade of the man who swears from actual knowledge? Is Congress at liberty to set that aside? It does not pass for anything that the department should not consider it of sufficient consequence to grant a pension on it. Let the department judge for itself. We judge for ourselves.

This matter has been submitted to a committee in the nature of submission to a jury, and that committee has returned a verdict awarding the man a pension. The gentleman from West Virginia comes and asks it be set aside. I do not know his particular object in asking it be set aside, but we are here this evening for this kind of legislation, and for myself I see no good reason why we should tolerate objection which finds no vindication in the testimony presented on the part of the gentleman making it, or why we should refuse to pass this bill.

If these gentlemen who object will submit any testimony; if they will rise in their places and say they have knowledge of circumstances which make against the case reported by the committee, so far as I am concerned I am willing to take it into consideration. But why should these gentlemen interpose objection and arrest all legislation without any testimony to justify them in delaying action until the people who wait on what we do here shall have passed away? Why should Congress make unnecessary delay when, while these gentlemen are making their speeches against these cases, the claimants by death may be placed beyond all reach of relief? So long as a case comes here upon the unanimous report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, backed by the testimony meeting the technical requirements of the law, I see no reason why this sort of legislation should be resisted.

These gentlemen talk about this man sleeping on his rights. I do not believe it is a matter of disgrace that a man who may have been injured while in the discharge of his duty should have seen fit not to move instantly for what the law would allow him to recover. While I do not believe that to be a matter of disgrace, no more do I believe it to be the occasion for refusing him the justice which the facts demand. There are many of us who received injuries twenty years ago, and we are sleeping on our rights to-day. So long as an honorable man can win some sort of support for himself he will not ask the Government to put itself in place of his ability to labor. It is to the credit and honor of any applicant that he has abstained from putting himself in what may be in the estimation of some a dishonorable position, but nevertheless the contract remains that the Government agreed to when it received the service of these people, and that is to put itself in place of their ability to earn a living for themselves if that ability should become impaired.

So far as I am concerned I see no occasion why this bill should be laid aside or passed over. This evening has been set apart by an order of the House for the consideration of these pension cases, and it seems to me we should proceed to consider them. We might as well fight it out at one time as another, and if there are not enough members here to-night to meet the technical requirement of a quorum, we should insist hereafter a quorum should be present so that prompt action can be had on these cases. They are of as much dignity and appeal to our sense of justice as strongly as any that can come before Congress.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Did the gentleman understand me as objecting?

Mr. LAIRD. No, sir.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I was satisfied with the statement of the honorable gentleman from Michigan and perfectly content to leave it that way. The question is in doubt. But I beg leave to say something in reply to the honorable gentleman from Nebraska who has just taken his seat.

The report in this case, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, has not disclosed a case for granting a pension. Why, the evidence shows that the claimant on the night before he was wounded had a quarrel with a man who subsequently shot him.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not think the gentleman desires to misrepresent the case; I am satisfied he does not; but, as I understand the reading of the report, there is no evidence of an altercation the night before. On the contrary, as I understand it, he was in attendance upon an entertainment of some kind, which, as I remember, is supported by the testimony set forth in the report.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I am positive the report states that he had an altercation the night before.

Mr. GIBSON. I hold the report in my hand, and will read that portion of it:

> It appears from the evidence in this case that the soldier had an altercation with a citizen at a place of amusement in Hopkinsville, Ky., on or about the 20th day of June, 1863.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I was mistaken in my recollection.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. It appears then from the report that the claimant had on the night before an altercation with a man who shot him, in consequence of what occurred at the time of the altercation.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Certainly.

Mr. LAIRD. Do you contend that the fact that he had an altercation the night before gave the citizen the right to shoot him the day afterward?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I do not know, because the report does not disclose, what the altercation was. It does not state what it was or what the cause of the difficulty was, but I tell the gentleman from Nebraska I do hold that the evidence the claimant introduced here, which is this, and I want to call the gentleman's attention to it so that he will read it carefully, is only the report of his captain to the effect not that he knows of the fact that the man with whom he had the altercation the night before shot him, but that it is his belief—a belief founded on no fact—that he shot him because he was a Union soldier.

That is the testimony, and this House is asked to grant a pension upon a plea founded upon no fact, but simply an opinion, and that, too, when the positive evidence discloses the fact that the man who shot him had an altercation with him. And yet your committee has not stated to this House what that altercation was. Why, it might have been something which would justify a man to take life or anything else. I do not know what it was. I do not assert that it was, but what I do say is that you have not given us to understand what the altercation was, and the only way in which you attempt to make it an injury received in the service of the Government is by asking us to act upon the belief of his captain that the shot was given because the man who shot him disliked him on the ground that he was in the service of the Government. Now, I say that is going rather too far, and I shall object to this case.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, in the language of the gentleman from Michigan, I have been here every evening, but have not taken up much time in discussions on this floor. There are, however, two or three statements which have been made during this discussion that I think should not be permitted to go unchallenged. The first is by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], who says that there is something of the merits of this claim lost by reason of the delay in making the application. The gentlemau may be mistaken in that respect. My own experience leads me to the belief, and I think I will be sustained by every gentleman here who has any charge of pension cases, that the bravest men, the most gallant soldiers, men who possessed the pride that enabled them to walk undauntedly up to the cannon's mouth, have been sustained by that same pride all these long years, with health shattered, constitutions broken, in poverty and want, with the hope that they might be eventually able to weather the gale without the assistance of the Government. And the bravest men, in most instances, men with the best records in pension cases, hospital records, are usually the men who appeared first to avail themselves of the privilege accorded to them under our pension laws. So that instead of delay operating against the claimant, to my mind it is one of the strongest reasons in the world why we should carefully, dispassionately, and calmly consider his claim.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] makes a statement to the effect that this House is asked to grant a pension in this case. The gentleman is mistaken in that. We are asked to grant no pension, but simply to bring this case within the rule under which the Pension Office can carefully scan the case and ascertain whether under the pension laws there is a legitimate claim for disability or not. We grant you that the case is not made up in this report. But you are asked to make it possible for the proper officers of the Government to investigate the facts and place the man upon the pension-roll, if in the course of the investigation it is ascertained that he presents a favorable case and becomes pensionable.

I may state also that I desire to answer another assertion made by the gentleman from Virginia on the last Friday evening that I had the honor to sit here with him on the floor of this House in the consideration of pension cases, when he stated that no man came up here to these evening sessions unless he was interested in some of these pension claims. The gentleman is mistaken in that also, as to the motives that lead some of us to attend these night sessions. I know with reference to myself, and I think with reference to all who attend them, men come here influenced purely and simply by a desire to see justice in the slightest degree done to a set of men to whom this country can not be sufficiently grateful.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. If the gentleman will read the remarks which I submitted he will find that I did not say what he seems to think I said.

Mr. PRICE. I was listening and took down the words, and thought I heard the gentleman correctly. I am delighted to find I am mistaken. I do not want that statement to be made. But in regard to the objection of the gentleman from Virginia, that time is the essence of the contract, and the other objection of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], I am not astonished at their objection to the bill with their understanding of the facts, but as they are mistaken, both of them, about the facts, I hope they will withdraw their objection and let this bill take the course of the others, and allow that justice be done which we have been so tardy in giving.

Mr. LAIRD. The gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from West Virginia must have heard this report read. If they had listened carefully to the reading they would have heard this, which is all the answer that is necessary to be made to the statement that the case comes to this House dishonored by the failure of the very officer of the claimant's company to make a statement in his behalf. I read from the report:

John P. Kullehn, of Wheatland, Knox County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) to the fact that he was a member of claimant's company and regiment, and to the shooting of the soldier by Savage at the time and in manner above detailed; did not see the shooting, but heard of it immediately after its occurrence.

C. P. Hollingsworth, of Bruceville, Knox County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) that he was the first lieutenant of claimant's company, and to the fact of the wounding of the soldier by Savage at Hopkinsville, as indicated by other witnesses; that the shooting was without provocation on the part of claimant; that he believes that said shot was given solely because Leveron was a Federal soldier.

Mr. GIBSON. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and myself had agreed, as I thought, that this bill should be passed over, and if these gentlemen who claim that they are so anxious to pension soldiers had just let me alone they could have passed a half-dozen bills in the time they have been assailing me. But I am entitled to put myself right. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] very pleasantly undertook to give his version of what I said. The gentleman is mistaken when he says I stated because this party had not filed his claim for a pension that is evidence that he was not entitled to it.

Mr. PRICE. What the gentleman said was that the fact that this soldier had slept on his right a great length of time militated against him.

Mr. GIBSON. I made this statement, that the fact the claimant had shown no disability, that he was not discharged for disability, and that he made no positive claim on that ground, the fact that he had slept that length of time on his claim militated against its validity. But I have no desire to discuss the case further than simply to vindicate myself. Let this case be passed over informally, and let us go on with the other business on the Calendar.

Mr. O'HARA. It is evident we can not pass this bill to-night. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MATSON. I have acceded to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia, who states that he desires to examine the evidence. I think that is fair, and that in the mean time the bill should be passed over informally.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally.

CUTLER S. DOBBINS.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 4024) granting a pension to Cutler S. Dobbins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cutler S. Dobbins, late captain of Company B, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension from the date of his discharge.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out these words:

And to pay him a pension from the date of his discharge.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4024) granting a pension to Cutler S. Dobbins, respectfully report:

That claimant was mustered into the military service of the United States as captain of Company B, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, September 3, 1862, and resigned on surgeon's certificate of disability January 16, 1863.

September 1, 1877, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging that while on the march from Louisville to Crab Orchard, and from thence to Columbia, Ky., October 7, 1862, he contracted a violent form of hemorrhoids; also deafness, contracted at the battle of Perryville, Ky. The claim for first named disability was rejected June 29, 1878, on the ground of existence of disability prior to enlistment, and the last named January 15, 1883, on the ground of no record of deafness, and inability to furnish satisfactory evidence of its origin.

Dr. Dewitt C. Brown, of Shoals, Ind., whose record as a soldier is verified by the records of the Adjutant-General, and who is shown to be a reputable physician, testifies January 27, 1878—

"That he was hospital steward of the Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; has been well acquainted with claimant since 1858; was his family physician in 1859; claimant was a sound man when he enlisted; affiant enlisted in his company and was shortly afterward made hospital steward, and was with the regiment until October 1, 1862, at Louisville; claimant was sound up to that time; did not see him again until October 18, 1862, after the battle of Perryville. On the 20th of November, while the regiment was on the march, claimant had a severe attack of hemorrhoids; I saw his condition near Rolling Fork River; that he continued so to suffer until he resigned; I saw him again after my return in 1865; the disease had then become violent; prescribed for him professionally; large tumors formed and at times bled profusely; he continued to suffer from that time to the present."

Hon. James E. Walker, Loogootee, late a member of the Indiana Legislature, and a lieutenant of Company B, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, corroborates the evidence of Dr. Brown, with the exception of treatment since discharge.

Dr. John C. Bever, of Vincennes, Ind., testifies March 23, 1878, that he attended claimant's family from 1859 to 1866; he has examined his books, and does not find any prescriptions for hemorrhoids; thinks it was brought on by claimant's military service.

It is shown that Dr. William Delamater, who treated claimant after his return from the Army, is now dead.

Dr. William Z. Smith, United States examining surgeon at Shoals, Ind., in an examination of claimant November 24, 1877, reports:

"I find applicant has hemorrhoids. Bowels protruding as large as an ordinary fist; ulcerated and bleeding. On introduction of finger into bowels I find an uneven surface and four distinct enlargements; on least amount of handling bleeds freely. Has all the appearance of a very bad case of piles. Disability one-half."

The incurrence of deafness is shown to have first become manifest after the battle of Perryville, in which claimant participated. This fact is shown by the evidence of Dewitt C. Brown, M. D., hospital steward of the regiment; Thomas Watson, private in claimant's company; also Alexander Shavum, of said company and regiment. The presence of these soldiers at the time and place is verified by the records of the Adjutant-General; and all are now residents of Martin County, Indiana. Lewis Brooks, of West Shoals, Ind., colonel of claimant's regiment, says soldier has become almost deaf since the war.

R. C. Stephens, clerk of the circuit court of Martin County from 1859 to 1867, testifies February 11, 1882:

"That after claimant came out of the Army in 1863, and while practicing in said court, his hearing commenced to fail, and he has gradually grown worse."

Frank Baker, of Shoals, Ind., clerk of the Martin circuit court from 1867 to 1875, testifies February 13, 1882:

"That shortly after claimant's return from the Army the hearing in his left ear commenced to fail, and has gradually grown worse."

Hon. W. R. Gardner, a prominent lawyer of Washington, Daviess County, Indiana, testifies June 30, 1882:

"Has practiced law the past nineteen years in same district and counties as claimant; since he came out of service he has been deaf to such an extent as to seriously interfere with his practice."

That claimant was free from deafness and piles prior to and at the time of his enlistment is shown by the testimony of Hon. James E. Walker, who was a lieutenant in claimant's company; Lewis Brooks, colonel of the regiment; Dr. Dewitt C. Brown, James B. Freeman, William G. Greene, Michael Shirey, Thomas Hart, Samuel Albaugh, Wilson Chenoweth, Hon. James Braden, late candidate for Congress in the second Indiana district, and other neighbors and intimate associates of claimant, all of whom are shown to be reputable citizens. These witnesses also testify to the continuance of the disabilities of the claimant to the present time.

The testimony in the case is voluminous and conflicting, but is overwhelmingly in favor of the soundness of the soldier at the time of his enlistment and conclusive as to the continuance of the same from his discharge to the present time. Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the word "infantry," in line 7, and when so amended that the bill pass.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MATSON, there were—ayes 15, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BAGLEY having resumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 374) granting a pension to William Boone;
A bill (H. R. 6703) to increase the pension of Mrs. D. P. Woodbury;
A bill (H. R. 5630) granting a pension to George W. Rugg;
A bill (H. R. 1653) granting a pension to John R. Hurlburt;
A bill (H. R. 5378) granting a pension to Henry Milkey;
A bill (H. R. 7302) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith;

A bill (H. R. 1219) granting a pension to Charles Hendrix;
A bill (H. R. 6357) granting a pension to Christian Bauman;
A bill (H. R. 4569) granting a pension to David Urbansky;
A bill (H. R. 6197) granting a pension to Peter Falkner;
A bill (H. R. 6663) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Caroline Lewis; and
A bill (H. R. 4556) granting a pension to Joseph Williams.

JOSEPH RAIBLE.

A bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with the following amendment:

Add at the end of the bill the following: "In lieu of all other pensions paid him."

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I shall have to object to the passage of that bill. Action was taken upon it by the committee while I was in the cloak-room.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I suggest that action be first taken on the other bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. ENGLISH. This applicant is one of my constituents, being a resident of Indianapolis. I hope the objection interposed by the gentleman from Virginia against the bill will not prevail.

In reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] at the session of last Friday night, I wish to say that my colleague from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], has no personal acquaintance with this applicant, has never seen him, has no special interest in him; and the applicant is not a resident of his district. Nor have I any personal interest in this applicant. This bill was introduced in this House by my predecessor; and I have no interest in it beyond my desire that a just claim should prevail. The applicant is not a political follower of mine, but is an ardent supporter of the political party that I oppose, and was zealous in his opposition to my election to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not split hairs as to the exact date at which this soldier gave up his right arm in the service of his country. I do not care whether it was a few days before or a few days after he was formally mustered out of the United States service. It is sufficient that he was at the time (whether technically or not) practically still in the service of the United States and in the line of duty; and while acting in obedience to the commands of his superior officers he suffered this disability. I shall not search for far-fetched technicalities with which to oppose the pensioning of this gallant soldier, but, on the contrary, would urge every just argument in his behalf. I know him. I know his helpless condition. I know his needs. I know that he is deserving of his country's helping hand. I hope that the objections of the gentleman from Virginia will not prevail.

The question being taken on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

Amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House to bills of the following titles were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were respectively ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2485) for the relief of Treadwell Seaman, jr.;
A bill (H. R. 6803) granting a pension to John T. Brake;
A bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Ellen A. Vance;
A bill (H. R. 5103) granting a pension to J. F. Justice; and
A bill (H. R. 4024) granting a pension to Cutler S. Dobbins.

SARAH C. THOMAS.

A bill (H. R. 1841) granting a pension to Sarah C. Thomas, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a recommendation that it lie on the table, was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DINGLEY: Petition of Gustavus Pease, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. W. L. WILSON: Petition relating to the claim of William Lloyd—to the same committee.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petitions relating to the claims of the heirs of Margaret Rawlings, deceased; of Mary A. Blackwell, and of Erastus T. Allen—severally to the same committee.

The following petitions for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill with Senate amendments were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Pensions:

By Mr. BOYLE: Of citizens of Waynesburg and of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. J. H. BREWER: Of soldiers of the Mexican war, of Manchester, N. J.

By Mr. CONVERSE: Of John W. Free and 71 others, citizens of Perry County, Ohio.

By Mr. ELDREDGE: Of Chester Clark and 42 others, of Monroe County, Michigan.

By Mr. FUNSTON: Of citizens of Fort Scott, Kans.

By Mr. HALSELL: Of citizens of Logan and of Edmonson Counties, Kentucky.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: Of citizens of Beaver County, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. S. H. MILLER: Of citizens of Spartansburg, of Mercer County, of Milesburg, and of Butler, Pa.

By Mr. G. W. RAY: Of 62 citizens of Morris, Otsego County, and of 54 citizens of Pitcher, Chenango County, New York.

By Mr. OSSIAN RAY: Of John S. Collins and 72 others, of Gilson, Alstead & Marlow, New Hampshire.

By Mr. STEPHENSON: Of citizens of Waupaco, and of Marathon County, Wisconsin.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND: Of 29 citizens of Marion County, Illinois.

By Mr. WALLACE: Of W. M. Young and 62 others, citizens of Mahoning County; of John Wilkins and 67 others, citizens of Carroll and Del Roy Counties; of William Halaerstadt and 11 others, of Columbiana County, and of John O. McGowan and 59 others, of Youngstown, Ohio.

By Mr. WORTHINGTON: Of William Winship and 60 others, of Cuba; of John K. Hindson and 40 others, of Fulton County; and of John F. Linn and 60 others, of Knox County, Illinois.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 20, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

JAMES G. FAIR, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter of Mr. Robert Furman, of Schenectady, N. Y., on the subject of the establishment of a United States penitentiary as recommended in the annual report of the Attorney-General; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, favoring the purchase by the Government of the engravings and etchings of that association, to be placed in the National Museum in Washington; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the petition of John L. Cleveland, of Bridgewater Corners, Vt., late of Company B, Third Vermont Volunteers, praying that he may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition signed by the presidents of several marine insurance companies of Boston, praying the aid of Congress toward the proposed cable communication between Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard, and the mainland. An appropriation was made last year for that purpose, but it was not enough to even begin the work without a great waste; so it was concluded not to spend it, but to ask for a similar appropriation this year. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Cigarmakers' Association of Green Bay, Wis., remonstrating against the ratification of the reciprocity treaty between the Spanish West India Islands and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of several hundred citizens of the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the repeal of all acts fixing the term of administrative offices at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a memorial of 103 firms of importers and jobbers of tobacco of the city of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the petition of Lee, Fried & Co., Rector, Wilhelmy & Co., and others, hardware dealers of Omaha, Nebr., and the Northwest, praying for increased water-way facilities from the West to the East, and for the building of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

He also presented a memorial of cigar-makers of Omaha, Nebr., and a memorial of cigar-makers of Lincoln, Nebr., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Spain; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2481) for the relief of Jonathan Cone and William K. Kelly; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2482) to amend sections 1 and 2 of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory," approved June 3, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2483) to amend section 2347 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the entry of coal lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2484) granting a pension to the widow of the late Commander S. Dana Greene, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PROVIDENCE HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate an estimate of the cost of the proposed improvement of the harbor of Providence, R. I., by the removal of Green Jacket Shoals to the depth of twenty-five feet at mean low water.

APOLLOS HALE.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill (S. 1254) referring the claim of Apollos Hale, administrator, to the Court of Claims, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims. I do this by consent of the chairman of the committee and the Senator who made the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be taken from the Calendar, and recommitted to the Committee on Claims. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. INGALLS. Under Rule V, I ask leave to absent myself from the service of the Senate for two weeks after this day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks leave of absence for two weeks after this day. If there be no objection, leave of absence will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 374) granting a pension to William Boone;
A bill (H. R. 6703) to increase the pension of Mrs. D. P. Woodbury;
A bill (H. R. 5630) granting a pension to George W. Rugg;
A bill (H. R. 1653) granting a pension to John R. Hurlburt;
A bill (H. R. 5378) granting a pension to Henry Milkey;
A bill (H. R. 7302) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith;
A bill (H. R. 1219) granting a pension to Charles Hendrix;
A bill (H. R. 6357) granting a pension to Christian Bauman;
A bill (H. R. 4569) granting a pension to David Urbansky;
A bill (H. R. 6197) granting a pension to Peter Falkner;
A bill (H. R. 6663) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Caroline Lewis;
A bill (H. R. 4556) granting a pension to Joseph Williams;
A bill (H. R. 2485) for the relief of Treadwell Seaman, jr.;
A bill (H. R. 6803) granting a pension to John T. Brake;
A bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Ellen A. Vance;
A bill (H. R. 5103) granting a pension to Joshua F. Justice;
A bill (H. R. 4024) granting a pension to Cutler S. Dobbins; and
A bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee, and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes.

SURVEY OF NICARAGUAN CANAL ROUTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 106) declaring the action of the Secretary of the Navy in sending an expedition to Nicaragua to be illegal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORGAN. I move——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the joint resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. The question is on the motion to take it up, which motion is not open to debate. Senators in favor of the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, the title of which has been named, will say "ay;" contrary opinion "no." [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it. The joint resolution is before the Senate, and the question is, Shall it be read the second time?

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate consider the joint resolution in secret legislative session.

Mr. VEST. I can not hear the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that on the question now pending the doors be closed. Is there a second?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I second the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is seconded by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate with closed doors proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

After three hours and twenty-five minutes the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

While the doors were closed, a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I.

The message also announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. JOHN D. LONG of Massachusetts managers at the conference on its part.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair) laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives, announcing its further disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate still further insist upon its amendments to the said bill and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

The doors having been reopened, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 2041) granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee, and attaching it to the middle district of said State; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives for the holiday recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 16, 1884.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January, 1885.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. What is the report of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The resolution is reported favorably. The question is on agreeing to it. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I do not mean by calling up this resolution to commit myself to the doctrine of having a vacation if there be any business whatever that can be done, but I think we should understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the condition of things is such that the Senate can sit here and proceed with its work. If it be true that there is to be no co-ordinate branch of the legislative department in all probability in a condition to aid us in our work, without going into any particular condition of things on that matter—I suppose I may say that under the rules—it would be useless for the Senate to sit here and spend ten days without a quorum in this branch, accomplishing nothing. I expect myself to be very strongly influenced by the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to what is likely to happen. It seems to me we ought to keep the thing in our power in some way if we can.

Mr. ALLISON. The situation, as I understand it, is simply this: Last year the House passed the regular naval appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, and the Senate passed that bill with certain amendments. The differences between the two Houses continued up to the very last day of the session. Then it was found impossible to agree, and for temporary purposes the House passed a bill providing for the support and maintenance of the Navy for six months covering the period up to the 1st of January, with the original bill as passed by the House and the Senate amendments pending between the two Houses.

When we came here again at this session the bill appeared in the Senate, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] having charge of the bill asked a vote of the Senate in reference to the amendments, and the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill and asked a conference with the House. The House made no response to that request, but either a day or two before or after, or perhaps on the same day, passed another bill extending the appropriations of 1883 to the 1st day of July, 1885. The bill came to the Senate, and the Senate submitted certain amendments to that bill, and returned it to the House with those amendments. The House disagreed, and a conference between the two Houses resulted.

As I understand the situation, not being a member of either of these committees of conference, the House conferees absolutely refuse to consider the Senate amendments, and substantially say to the Senate: "You must take this extension bill or else submit to whatever may follow." A new conference was ordered to-day, but the conferees have not yet reported to the Senate. It is known to us all that on the 1st day of January all appropriations for the Navy will cease, and every Senator must judge for himself whether it is the duty of the Senate to adjourn until the 5th of January with a knowledge of the fact that there will be no appropriations for the Navy after the 1st of January. That is the situation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, after the action taken by the Senate yesterday in insisting upon its amendments to the naval appropriation bill by a unanimous vote the action of the Senate was duly communicated to the House, which insisted upon its position and appointed conferees and sent the bill back to the Senate, where it arrived about 2 o'clock to-day, and here conferees were appointed joining with the action of the House in that regard. I took occasion at once to send word to the House that the Senate conferees would be ready at any time, and proposing a conference at once. The House conferees have not appeared. I may say, however, that the member of the House who is chairman of the committee has been here and assures me that a conference is useless unless the Senate will recede from its position.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator what the exact position of the House conferees is. Do they not refuse to consider the Senate amendments?

Mr. HALE. I was coming to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon.

Mr. HALE. I am advised that a conference is useless; that the House insist that the Senate shall take their principle of appropriating, the rule that they have followed of going back and taking the appropriations of the last year and giving half of them for the rest of the fiscal year; and that they will not consider the Senate amendments, and that is accompanied with the statement that the House will never back down.

Under these circumstances, representing, as I presume he did, his conferees, although they were not with him, we have had no conference, although the Senate conferees have been ready to meet the House at any or at all times since the conference was appointed here, about 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him in that connection, does he understand the position of the House to be as represented by its conferees, that if the House chooses to vote, say, $300,000,000 a year for the support of the Government under a joint resolution, without designating the precise purposes to which it is to be applied, the Senate is to follow upon that principle of appropriations?

Mr. HALE. I do not know what would happen under that condition. The House committee is not willing to take the appropriations of last year's bill, and give them in detail, and make them apply to the next year. That is not the objection the Senate makes.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the principle would be, that we must adopt for the year 1885 the appropriations as they were made and distributed in the year 1883.

Mr. HALE. Precisely, that is it; that is the attitude of the House, that for the residue of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the appropriations made for the year ending June 30, 1884, shall be taken as the basis, either in gross or in detail, it does not make any difference, and applied to the wants of the present year. The House refuses to consider the Senate amendments, which cover the action of the House itself at the last session of Congress as sent to the Senate and matured by the Senate; and upon that, so far as the Senate can be notified, it has been notified to-day that the House will never yield.

Mr. RANSOM. That is not the report of the conference committee?

Mr. HALE. As I have said, we have had no meeting of the conference committee; I am only repeating the statement of the leader of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Maine pardon me one second?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. RANSOM. This morning, if I apprehend the question properly, the House insisted upon its position, but sent a proposition to the Senate for another conference and has actually appointed the conference.

Mr. HALE. As the Senate has done also.

Mr. RANSOM. As the Senate has done also.

Mr. HALE. And the Senate has sent word that it is ready to confer.

Mr. RANSOM. Then, if the Senator from Maine will pardon me again, I apprehend that we should be controlled by that fact, and that the Senate can do nothing in reference to the matter in any way until there is an official report from the Senate conferees after meeting with the conferees on the part of the House. Anything that we do upon that matter would not be well advised until that conference had actually taken place, because whatever may be the impression of the Senator from Maine, or myself, or any other Senator, or any one member of the House, we are confronted by the fact that this morning the House invited the Senate to another conference upon this subject.

Mr. HALE. To which the Senate has agreed.

Mr. RANSOM. To which the Senate has agreed, and there the matter stands.

Mr. HALE. That undoubtedly would be the fact, and nothing more would come up commonly until the conference had reported; but the question of which I speak is brought out now by the fact that we are confronted with another matter, and that is the adjournment resolution running over the holidays. Yesterday the Senate unanimously took ground on its amendments to the naval appropriation bill. A call of the yeas and nays disclosed no negative vote. This took place when the subject was under consideration:

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments to the bill. The question is on that motion.

Mr. FRYE. I am in favor of insisting for the reasons given by both of the conferees who have spoken; but suppose the Senate insists by a united vote and then to-morrow adjourns for three weeks.

Mr. HAWLEY. We will not adjourn.

Mr. FRYE. That was the suggestion I desired to make, that if the Senate insists and really means to insist and the House holds its position, as a matter of course, to be consistent, we can not adjourn, because on the 1st day of January there will be no appropriation available for the Navy.

Now, the Senate has taken that position; and it is not upon an unimportant matter, for these things are likely to occur frequently if now adopted or consented to by the Senate. At any time, instead of deliberately considering the special needs of any Department of the Government for the existing year and going through the painful labor necessary to mature a bill for the existing year under existing conditions, it is so much easier to go back to an old year and appropriate on that basis in general terms as the House has done, that it is a precedent which ought not to be established where it can be avoided.

I for one should be glad to see the Senate maintain its attitude, as I believe it will, on the amendments to the bill. Whatever may have been the action of the House, whether that body has adjourned from day to day or has adjourned over for three days with the understanding that it will adjourn over again for three days and do no business, I should be glad to see the Senate show that it is in earnest in this matter and that it is ready to meet the House and make the ordinary adjournment to-day and appear here on Monday morning ready to do business.

There is another question that has occurred to me. I speak now hypothetically, for we do not know by the RECORD. If the House has already passed a resolution that when it adjourns to-night it will adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, what is the effect of that upon the resolution already passed for an adjournment over the Christmas holidays? Has the Senate got really anything before it to act upon? Has not the House taken counter action that invalidates what it has formerly done?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, and Mr. RANSOM. No.

Mr. HALE. Then if that be so (I only suggested that question) the Senate on Monday can take up the House resolution and pass it. If it can do it now after the House has passed a resolution that it will adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, then on Monday, or Tuesday, or any day, the Senate can take up the House resolution if it has not been invalidated by any action of the House, and if the House has adjourned to meet on Wednesday, and then from that time three days more, the House is still then practically in session and the resolution which it has passed to adjourn over the Christmas holidays remains on our table alive, and we can take it up at any time.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him what is the form of the resolution as he understands it? He has had it before his committee. Is it not that when the two branches adjourn on the 20th of December, they shall be adjourned by their presiding officers until the 5th of January?

Mr. HALE. It is the common resolution. The Secretary has it, I suppose.

Mr. HOAR. If that be so, and it is not passed before we adjourn to-day, we might take a recess; they leave it in our power unquestionably; but if we adjourn to-day what power have we to order that when the Senate adjourns on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday it shall adjourn until the 5th of January? We can not do that without the assent of the House, and the House can not give that assent because it will have no quorum until the 5th of January.

Mr. HALE. How does the resolution read, Mr. Secretary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the House resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 16, 1884.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January, 1885.

Mr. HALE. We will assume that the House has already passed another resolution, that when it adjourns to-night, instead of its being adjourned until the 5th day of January, as the resolution prescribes, which we have not acted upon, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Maine if it is not almost absolutely certain that there will be no quorum of the House after to-day?

Mr. HALE. That is a matter which we can not assume, of which we can have no knowledge. I would say to the Senator in answer to that, the presumption is that if the House of Representatives has taken an attitude on an important matter it is not going to run away and leave it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should suppose that it would be impossible to reach a vote in both Houses upon a report of a conference committee, perhaps, before the 5th of January, even if the Senate should remain in session here.

Mr. HALE. If the House remains, the matter can be got at so soon as the conference meet, and an hour will settle whether it can agree or not.

Mr. MCPHERSON. There is one other question that I should like to ask the Senator while he is on his feet, because I have listened here for the last three or four days to continued expressions criticising the action of the House on the bill, and the criticisms appeared to be very much sympathized with on this side of the Chamber. The original bill coming to us from the House was an appropriation bill in proper form. It reached us last session. It appropriated in detail, as former appropriation bills had done, the amount of money needed for the Navy. The Senate added to that something that was not needed for an appropriation for the Navy and did not belong upon that appropriation bill; it might almost be said that it could not have been placed there under the rules.

In looking at the Senator's speech of yesterday the statement is there made that upon the last day of the session, the Senate fighting for its amendment to the last day of the session, an emergency bill was necessary. The House passed the emergency bill and sent it to the Senate. No other course was possible. One branch of Congress would have been again accused, perhaps, of an attempt to starve the Government; the House unquestionably would have been the one charged, while if either of the bodies was guilty it was the Senate. In order that that charge might not be made against the House, they passed an emergency bill. The Senate took it up and passed it; and now we have the curious condition of affairs of the Senate attaching to a regular appropriation bill an amendment which did not belong to it nor never has belonged to it. We have already had five or six conferences upon that question, the House in each case instructing its conference committee to insist upon their original bill, and here we find the Senate twelve or thirteen months after that bill reached here still insisting upon an amendment to a bill and rather than give that up you will continue the session during the holidays.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senate insists upon all the amendments.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand why, after the explanation given yesterday, the Senator seeks to present this controversy between the two Houses as one upon the extraordinary items which were put on in the Senate, which the Senator says had no business on the appropriation bill. Of course he refers to the amendments for the building of the new cruisers. That question was discussed in the Senate, passed upon as a point of order, and it was decided that the amendments did belong upon the bill. But I do not propose to discuss that; that is not the controversey between the two Houses. Here is the language which I used yesterday, and I repeat it:

Moreover, we said, "as there are large differences in amounts, as the bill which was matured last session contains the provision for the new cruisers and all the extra expenditure involved in that enterprise, the Senate is willing here to say that it recognizes the fact that we do not agree to give up these cruisers, but if the House insists that it will not put them on the appropriation bill, the Senate conferees feel that they can not drive the House on this subject, so that there would be, if we could consider and confer upon all the items, probably no difficulty."

And there would be none. That is not the controversy. The Senator from New Jersey shall not befog the issue by bringing that in. The House conferees will not confer upon the items; they will not even consider them.

Mr. ALLISON. Any of them.

Mr. HALE. They will not give the Senate conferees the opportunity to recede on the cruisers amendment, but decline to consider any of the Senate amendments and insist that this body shall take the bill as it came from the House, or the principle of the bill as it came from the House, of appropriating on last year's bill, and the Senator can not bring the controversy as to the new cruisers into this, because the Senate conferees have eliminated that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. When the House of Representatives sent the second bill, which the Senator in his speech of yesterday called "the emergency bill," did not that supersede after you had accepted it the former bill sent by the House?

Mr. HALE. There is no superseding at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senate accepted the emergency bill, took it up, and passed it, for what? For a naval appropriation, the very thing which the original bill was intended to cover.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator refer to the emergency bill passed on the 7th of July last?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The last day of the session.

Mr. HALE. The last day of the last session?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. So far from that superseding the old bill, it was intended to be simply a general appropriation for the emergency for six months only. The old bill remained with every right, subject to be taken up the moment Congress reassembled; and had there been any intention at that time that the emergency bill then proposed should cover more than six months, it were just as easy for the House to have made the bill for the entire year; but by selecting six months for it to run, and only six months, it gave Congress the right when it reassembled to take up the old bill that was pending before it and pass it, as was the intention at that time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, let me go a little further. That was the last day of that session, and let me read the Senator's own words of yesterday:

By the necessity of the case that had to be done.

Speaking of the emergency bill. We have reached to-day, so far as the wants of the Navy Department are concerned, exactly the same condition. A resolution is before the Senate from the House to adjourn to a period of time beyond which the Navy Department can not run without appropriations. We are now considering the question whether we shall so adjourn, or whether we shall continue the session in order that something may be done. Here is another emergency bill exactly like the one that was sent here six months ago, which made appropriations for six months. Now, the Senate would be just as much justified at this moment in taking up the House bill proposing to make similar appropriations for six months more, and treating it as a second emergency bill, because just so long as we insist on the amendments to the original bill, which I claim had no place there whatever, in my opinion, and quite right, too, the House will not yield.

Mr. HALE. Let me state the differences. In the first place, at the close of the last sesssion we were confronted with a long adjournment of six months, or nearly that time, which we are not now. In the next place, the emergency bill at that time was brought in in the last stages of the session, and, as I said yesterday, not anything else could be done. On the other hand, at this session nearly two weeks ago the House of Representatives sent us over, not the appropriation bill which they matured last year, and which was in conference, but sent us over, while the Senate had at least ten days or a fortnight to work in, another emergency bill, and insisted that we should take that when there was no stress of weather upon us; and the Senate ever since has been trying to bring the House to substitute for that the regular appropriation bill for the rest of the year. I hope the Senate will maintain its attitude upon that question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator just one question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it not absolutely certain that one House or the other must recede from its position before a naval appropriation bill can pass? The Senate have insisted now for about nine or ten months on certain propositions, and four or five different conferences have been had, the House every time instructing its conferees not to yield. Now I want to know how much longer the Senate proposes to go on.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from New Jersey will allow me to make a suggestion to him here. In all the conferences had at the last session the House was insisting upon the bill that it had itself prepared for this fiscal year, and rejected the Senate amendments.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Up to the passage of the emergency bill.

Mr. BECK. Now, all the Senate conferees ask the House to do is to take up the bill it then insisted upon, passed by the House, prepared on estimates, and act upon that, and if it sees fit let it reject the Senate amendments. We ask them to take up their own bill. Last year we passed an emergency bill on the estimates of the preceding year, which were the only thing we had to go upon, but the bill which they themselves then presented and maintained they now refuse to present and refuse to consider, and they also refuse to consider any of the amendments we have made. We might be willing to recede from every amendment made in the Senate to their bill, appropriating for the current fiscal year on estimates for this year; but they will not give us a chance even to do that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. One-half the amount of money asked for in the original bill for which the House contended during last session was appropriated by the emergency bill and has been already expended.

Mr. BECK. That is properly credited upon our amendments, the amounts being made up by the clerks of both committees and agreed upon.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Now the House again send what is called another emergency bill or a bill of like character. The Senate has persistently refused to assist the House in passing the original bill. That is the fact. Now the House sends another bill, conceiving another emergency to have arisen, and the Senate refuses to consider that either in committee or in the Senate, refuses to recede from its former position upon the original bill; and the House is blamed, criticism after criticism is made here day after day by Senators upon the action of the House of Representatives in insisting upon what to me is the plainest, fairest proposition ever submitted to the Senate. The House has as much right to insist upon its position as we have upon ours, and inasmuch as the Senate took a general appropriation bill, which was a bill made out in detail, made out as every appropriation bill in the past, and attached to that a condition which the House can not accept, we have the strange spectacle of holding session after session here during the holidays and at other times for the purpose of carrying out this little ridiculous fight; I can not call it anything else.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations. I report with an amendment the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to present a report from the Committee on Appropriations. It will be received if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to have the bill acted on now if the Senate will agree to it.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas was recognized on the pending resolution. The resolution of the House of Representatives proposing an adjournment of the two Houses from this day to the 5th of January next is before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this appears to be a repetition of the old problem of an irresistible force moving an impenetrable body. It is an illustration of the saying that you can lead a horse to water, but unless he is thirsty you can not make him drink. The controversy between the two Houses on this naval question is ancient. The naval appropriation bill that was passed by the House of Repenetratives at the last session was amended by the Senate and the propositions of amendment sent to the House, submitted to a conference, and finally abandoned by the Senate conferees, and an emergency bill passed. At this session the conflict has been again renewed. The House sent here an emergency bill, I understand, the present appropriations expiring on the 1st of January, to cover the remaining period until the 30th of June next, to which the Senate appended amendments substantially those which they abandoned the previous session, and submitted them to the House of Representatives, where they again went into conference; and we are now confronted with the statement that unless the bill is agreed to by the 1st of January certain disastrous consequences are to ensue.

The debate arises upon the proposition to adjourn from this day until the 5th of January. We are informed that the House of Representatives have adjourned or agreed to adjourn from to-day until Wednesday, and the emergency that is anticipated by the Senator from Maine will occur by Thursday of the week following the one immediately before us. It appears to me, therefore, that the only question is what we are going to do in this particular juncture that is now before us. Is there any reasonable or just expectation that if we should remain here from day to day the bill that the Senate conferees desire to have passed will be agreed to by the 1st of January, so that anything will be gained by this process?

I speak entirely from a disinterested standpoint, because, having received leave of absence, of which I intend to avail myself, it is to me practically indifferent whether the adjournment resolution is agreed to or not. But there is a question, it appears to me, that the Senate ought not to stultify itself about. We ought not to do a foolish or a frivolous thing. We have the power, of course, to sit here from day to day until the 1st day of January, or until the 5th day of January, the period contemplated by the resolution; but the question is, what is to be gained by it? The 1st day of January will have arrived and the appropriations will have expired. What is the practical question that confronts us? I should like the Senator from Maine to advise us, he being the Neptune of the body with his trident—what will be the result in case there should be no appropriation for the Navy the 1st of January?

Mr. HALE. I shall be glad to give the Senator from Kansas and other Senators what is my view about that matter. I do not suppose that because either House is unreasonably insisting on its particular ground and thereby an appropriation fails, during the first five days or ten days of the succeeding year that Department of the Government will expire.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I wanted to know. I feared from the vaticinations of the Senator from Maine that in case this bill did not pass by the 1st of January the feeble remnants of the American Navy, about which we have heard so much, would probably be ingulfed in the deep.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator must have gone to his own imagination for those forebodings, for I have not certainly felt them myself, and I did not mean to express them.

Mr. INGALLS. Then what is all this difficulty about? If there is to be no serious consequence by reason of the expiration of the appropriations, if the flag is still to float and the sails still to be unbent, and the work to proceed in the navy-yards, and our gallant tars to receive their compensation, what is the reason that we can not adjourn four or five days?

Mr. HALE. That is for the Senate to consider, of course. Undoubtedly it is not as well that the Department should be left without appropriations for a single day.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly not.

Mr. HALE. But it is no killing matter, as I may say, if it comes about.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I am relieved. My apprehensions were that unless this thing was done the gravest consequences practically would ensue; but as there is nothing to be apprehended of course I feel better.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I now ask unanimous consent to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill, which I reported a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the Military Academy appropriation bill reported to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment, which was, in line 42, after the word "professors," to strike out "and officers (on increased rank);" and in line 43, after the word "service," to strike out "$9,525" and insert "$8,898.50;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay of professors for length of service, $8,898.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to submit a statement for the information of the Senate, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. The reductions that have been made from the estimates and the recommendations made to the Congress of the United States that have not been agreed to are embraced in this statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The Senator from Illinois asks that a statement presented by him be printed in the RECORD. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL—1886.

Amount of estimates for 1886	$393,344 78
Amount of bill as passed the House	310,021 64
Reduction made by Senate committee	626 50
Amount as reported to the Senate	309,395 14
The bill as reported less than the estimates	83,949 64
The bill as reported less than the act for 1885	5,168 36

The changes made by the bill as reported in the appropriations for 1885, are as follows:

Increase over 1885:

Mr. MCPHERSON. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not fully hear the Senator from Illinois. I ask the Senator if this bill as it stands increases the appropriations of last year?

Mr. LOGAN. It reduces them over $5,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Has the Senate increased the appropriations in the House bill?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; there is a small reduction of about a thousand dollars. There is very little difference between the bill as passed by the House and as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BUCHANAN RIVER, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. KENNA. I ask leave to submit at this time and have put on its passage a resolution asking for information from the Department of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the resolution for adjournment, which the Senate now resumes, the Senator from West Virginia asks consent to offer a resolution. If there be no objection it will be received.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a report showing the work done under the supervision of the United States engineers upon the Buchanan River in West Virginia, together with an estimate of the amount required to continue the prosecution of said work.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives relative to an adjournment.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Senator from Maine in charge of the naval bill to say that in his judgment it made no particular difference whether the appropriation bill was passed or not, the Navy Department would carry on its work. I say, if I understood the Senator in charge of the naval appropriation bill, he said in reply to an inquiry, that in his judgment it made no particular difference or no great difference whether the appropriation bill was passed before the 1st of January or not.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me to remind him of the language that I used. I did not say that it would make no particular difference. I said I did not believe the Navy Department would die; I did not believe the Department would disband. I said it was no killing matter. I did not attempt to belittle it. I believe just that. It is a bad thing to do. It is a bad thing for the Department. I know very well the statute under which no contracts can be made and no money paid out, but I think, notwithstanding that, animation would be maintained in the Navy Department for five days.

Mr. CONGER. Then, Mr. President, I understand the Senator to say in principle that the Navy may go on without any appropriation. If it can for five days I suppose it can for ten or one hundred.

Mr. HALE. Not necessarily.

Mr. CONGER. And as the representative of the Navy Department the Senator says it does not seem to make much difference whether Congress appropriates money for it or not; it will not die. Now, the question of the life and vitality and existence of the Navy has been presented by the Committee on Naval Affairs so much lately that it would seem as if the only idea which that committee has is whether it can keep the Navy alive, or if not whether law can be maintained, not whether appropriations shall be made, not whether the officers of the Navy Department shall violate continually the provisions of law.

Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

I had supposed, and that is the way we have been taught heretofore, that any officer of this Government who undertook, without an appropriation, unless it came under some of the exceptions which are in the law, to continue the business of a Department, to keep clerks in employ and keep officers in employ who would draw a salary, and who might say that by their employment there was an obligation on the Government to pay them, violated the law and was liable to impeachment, and liable to impeachment for violating the law for one day or five days or one hundred days. If the Executive of this Government can carry on all the Departments of the Government, whether Congress makes an appropriation for them or not, a greater or a less length of time, then the control of Congress over appropriations and over the management of the Departments of this Government ceases and the Executive has the power to run this Government independent of Congress.

Sir, I for one protest against any proposition that it is of little importance whether Congress makes any appropriations or not; that the Government will go on; that it will live on, no matter what violations of law are going on; and for myself I desire to say that I will not, by voting to adjourn and leave the Navy Department or any other Department without money to continue its labors and its existence and fulfill its contracts and pay its employés, I will not consent to adjourn even a day beyond the regular time.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator in that position, and I have already stated that I hoped the Senate would not agree to this adjournment; but when confronted with a question as to what would actually occur as to the dissolution of one of these Departments, I answered it according to what I believed would follow.

Mr. CONGER. Well, that does not come quite up to the backbone I had expected would be developed here. I thought the Senator let down this question and the principle of it, the whole theory of it, to a little idle phrase that the colors of the Department would not change or that it would not die. It is as much as to say to me and to other Sentors, "Well, after all, I must say it is better to have legal appropriations and let the Government work under law and not by the will of the Executive; but it is not very material, and I, as the representative of the Navy, say it is not very material."

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. I yield for a question.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator from Michigan himself think would actually happen to the Navy Department if from causes entirely beyond our control they were left for five days without appropriations of money under any existing law? What does the Senator himself think would happen to the Navy Department?

Mr. CONGER. I will tell the Senator in a moment. The law provides that there are certain things for the Army and Navy which may be done independent of an appropriation. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the naval appropriation bill, because probably it has escaped his memory if he ever heard——

Mr. HALE. I am listening attentively.

Mr. CONGER. Section 3732 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities for the current year.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. One word, and then I will yield with pleasure. The Senator from Maine very well says that the Navy will not starve, because (though he did not refer to it I do) the men may have subsistence and clothing and transportation. They can live. Now it is not a question whether they can live, whether their mouths may be filled and whether their bodies may be kept warm or cool, whatever may be the climate they are in; and therefore the answer of the Senator that they would not die is provided against by this provision of law. They are not to die from starvation.

Mr. HALE. I think my answer covered the case exactly on that statute.

Mr. CONGER. But the Senator did not refer at all to the duty of the officers of the Government, to the clerks of the Department, to keeping hundreds of men in employment with the implied obligation that they shall be paid their wages and salaries. These officers have no right to order a vessel anywhere to carry on at all naval operations, because by doing that they incur obligations.

I do not care to dwell upon that, but I did think the Senator was letting down a little from the true theory of government when he said we could neglect to pass laws and the Executive could go on in a royal, kingly manner to run this Government just as well as if this Congress had made appropriations and provided for it. Now, I will hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to remind the Senator from Michigan that in 1877, as he knows quite as well as I do, the Army appropriation bill failed, and there was no lawful appropriation except so far as that statute authorized the incurring of expense without an appropriation, and that is no appropriation. It was so from the 1st of July, 1877, until October, when an extra session of Congress was called by President Hayes.

Mr. CONGER. At that time the termination of Congress was a constitutional termination, I believe—the 4th of March—and then, although all these provisions in behalf of the Army for forage, subsistence, transportation, and clothing existed in the law, the emergency was so great that the President of the United States, with the approval and assent of the whole people of every party, immediately called an extra session of Congress to meet that emergency.

Mr. HOAR. It met in October.

Mr. CONGER. If I remember aright, the Senator from Massachusetts thought at that time that the failure to make the appropriations was a revolutionary and insurrectionary movement, and I think he denounced it with language and words and a force and vigor that I never expect to equal even in a case like this; and I call his attention to a review of his celebrated and interesting remarks on that occasion.

Mr. HOAR. I have no recollection myself of having made any. I think the Senator must remember some of his own.

Mr. CONGER. He was our leader then in opposition to this revolutionary mode of carrying on the Government. Now, I expect those kind of things from the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. What kind of things?

Mr. CONGER. He has obtained the leave of the Senate to go away; obtained it when he saw the storm gathering here and the doubt about whether we could adjourn or not. My friend from Kansas has that kind of sagacity which foresees the necessity, and for that he is remarkable, of immediate, quick, prompt action, and before there was this excitement and turmoil and confusion and doubt about whether we should have a quorum or not or adjourn or not, my friend comes, and with all that peculiar grace and suavity of his nature which endears us to him so much and endears him to us, he asked the Senate if they would permit him to go to the prairies of the West and enjoy the winter holidays. I do not know a Senator on this floor, even if he had the inclination to insist upon a member's being here, who would dare refuse our friend from Kansas liberty to go to the wilds of the West if he asked it. I have some little boldness myself now and then when I am really waked up to a thing; but I say without any hesitation that now in the midst of this danger to the Government, this crisis, as Artemus Ward would call it, all around us and among us and everywhere, if he asked to go even when the danger is that we should be left without a quorum Monday or Tuesday, I could not refuse to grant the Senator from Kansas leave to go.

But the Senator says he has no interest in this matter. That is the point I am coming to. Sir, the Senator from Kansas is the leader to whom I look for opposition to every violation of law, to every parliamentary or legal obstruction to the regular course of government. I have been accustomed to look to him on our side as the first man to oppose and repress any effort toward that monarchical, kingly power, whether executed and carried out by king or President, that forgets the Legislature of the people, the law-making power, and would carry on the Government on its own hook without appropriation. The idol is tottering on its pedestal, sir. A little cloud obscures from my vision the admiration with which I have always looked to that leader on such grave questions as this, and I hope he will regain his position and say that it is important that Congress should make the appropriations and that Congress should make the laws to run the Government, and not that the Executive shall make such laws. There is a vital principle involved there, and I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to review his remarks and lead us on as he has heretofore in the strict line of parliamentary and legislative duty, and then I shall be proud to follow him as I always have before.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for an adjournment is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senate what I understand to be the position in which we are placed, and I will certainly be very brief.

A bill which was passed at the last session of Congress, called the emergency act, authorized the Secretary of the Navy to expend 50 per cent. of the amount of the appropriations of 1883 for the first half of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. The objection that I had and have now, for I was on the conference committee, is that instead of taking the estimates made in 1884 for the fiscal year 1885, the estimates for 1883 were taken. It is well known to all Senators here that estimates differ annually. In fact one year some certain thing is required that perhaps may not be required the following year, and vice versa.

In reference to taking the estimates made in 1883 for 1884–'85, the proposition may be summed up in this way: The Senate and the House of Representatives by a bill authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to expend half the money appropriated for the year 1883, for the first half of the year, ending June 30, 1885. That is all there is of it, just in so many words. That was the bill which was passed, and that is the proposition of the House to-day. I objected to it as one of the conferees, first, for the reason that it was based upon the estimates for the wrong year; second, that it did not specify to what the money should be applied, except in general terms, that is, applying to a certain bureau a certain amount of money to be expended for its purposes, whereas regular appropriation bills, whether they are applicable to the Army or the Navy, specify particularly how the money shall be expended. Under such a character of bill as was passed by the House the Secretary of the Navy might in divers and sundry ways expend money in a direction which was not contemplated by the Congress of the United States. For that reason I objected to it.

A further reason is that it is not legislation of a character that should be consented to by the Congress of the United States, except in an extreme case. You might just as well appropriate $300,000 in one sum, a lump sum, as it is commonly called, and say to the Secretary of the Navy, "Apply this to the different bureaus of the Navy as you deem proper, or as seems to be proper for you to expend it." That is the meaning of the bill, and that is all there is in the bill.

My proposition would be that the amendments to the appropriation bill in reference to the cruisers, because they will not be agreed to, should be receded from by the Senate of the United States and that we then between the House and Senate agree upon the other amendments which were thought to be absolutely necessary by the Senate. If we can not agree on them let them be stricken off, let them be divided, or let such an agreement be made as is proper for a conference committee between the two Houses to make.

The conferees on the part of the House absolutely refused to confer in reference to these amendments and required us to confer only on their proposition, which is a bill like the emergency act passed at the last session, their bill making appropriations for the next six months. I disagreed to that and I disagree to it now, and as far as I am concerned I never will agree to it. The Senate can do as it likes, of course. I am but one; but I never will agree to that character of legislation when we have time before us to prosecute the duties that belong to us.

I have said this much only to give my views in reference to the matter, and to state substantially what I understand to be the position of affairs. When you come to sum it up it means nothing more than a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend 50 per cent. of the amount of the appropriations of 1883 as he deems proper where the expenditure is not restricted by the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, that when the two Houses adjourn to-day, they shall stand adjourned until the 5th of January next.

Mr. CONGER. I move to postpone the resolution until after the reading for information of the bill which has just come from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary motion. A motion to postpone must be to a day certain or indefinitely.

Mr. HALE. I think unanimous consent will be given that the House bill just sent in shall be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally and that the Chair lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be considered read the second time and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read at length.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let us have a full reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second reading will be at length.

The Secretary read the bill the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of providing for the expenses of the naval service for the month ending January 31, 1885, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum of money no greater in amount than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations of the fiscal year 1884 as thirty-one days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year and for the like purposes and continuing the same provisions relating thereto as were made by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883 (except as hereinafter declared), subject to all the limitations and conditions in respect to the disbursement of the appropriations hereby made that were imposed by said act, and the other laws of the United States upon or in respect to the appropriation made by said act: Provided, That nothing is appropriated by this act for the purposes set forth in said act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1884 under the heading "Increase of the Navy" and preceding the heading "Naval Academy," "For special ocean surveys and the publication thereof," or "For the purchase and manufacture, after full investigation and test, in the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of torpedoes adapted to naval warfare, or of the right to manufacture the same, and for the fixtures and machinery necessary for operating the same;" nor is there reappropriated any balance of the appropriation made for commencing the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns, with carriages and ammunition, that remained unexpended during the fiscal year 1883; but in lieu of such reappropriation there is hereby appropriated for such manufacture, during the thirty-one days herein provided for, the sum of $2,152.80; and that the clause under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks" commencing "For general maintenance of yards and docks" is amended so as to appropriate for the thirty-one days herein provided for the sum of $18,840.

That all appropriations made by the act of July 7, 1884, making temporary provision for the naval service for the six months ending December 31, 1884, or any balances thereof that may be unexpended at that date, except any balance for the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns as aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, reappropriated, continued, and made available for the thirty-one days ending January 31, 1885.

That the whole amount appropriated by this act for the support of the naval service for the thirty-one days herein provided for shall not exceed, exclusive of the amounts herein reappropriated and the amount payable from the income from the naval pension fund for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,160,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read the second time. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interfere, but I will state very briefly one objection to the bill. If we are to take the appropriations for 1883 for the year 1885 in homeopathic doses I do not know but that we might just as well take the whole dose at once. The objection, as shown by a unanimous vote of the Senate, was to appropriating for the next six months as we did for the preceding six months, but now the House sends us a bill appropriating up to the 31st of January. I suppose when the 31st of January comes they will propose to appropriate until the 4th of March, and in that way we are to take this character of legislation.

I state this as the reason why I shall certainly object to the consideration of the bill, for I do not believe in this kind of legislation. I think it is vicious and a character of legislation that ought not to be permitted by either branch of Congress, and especially by this branch.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no choice about this matter. I only wanted to get over a difficulty which seemed to me to be confronting us, and a chasm which appears to have been made by the disagreement of the two Houses. I thought that we might consider this bill to-day, inasmuch as the Appropriations Committee, I have no doubt, are as well informed as to its provisions now as they would be after a minute examination of it. I confess myself that I do not like the mode of legislation proposed in it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator that the very reason why I object to it is because we know exactly what it is. We have examined it, and it is the principle in it to which I object. The Senate voted against it yesterday unanimously.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This whole debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it was upon my motion that the yeas and nays were called yesterday for the purpose of expressing the sentiment of this body not so much upon the merits or demerits of the amendments which had been placed by the Senate upon a bill originating in the House, as upon the action of the House conferees as reported to us by the committee of conference unanimously, represented by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], that the House conferees would not even consider, read, weigh, or reason on the action of the Senate amendatory of the action of the House. The result of such a proposition is that the Senate is no longer a co-ordinate body, but it would become a mere register of the decrees of another body. That would be an abdication of the duty and of the dignity of the Senate to which I should be very unwilling to agree.

Therefore, without any regard to the character of the legislation proposed, I thought it right for the Senate, and I was very glad that the Senate concurred in that view, that the Senate should record themselves unanimously in favor of the committee who had properly asserted the right of this body, and the duty of this body which is higher than its right, in dealing with legislation touching supplies for the Government. That was the principle involved in the suggestion that I made.

Now, I agree with the Senator from Illinois that this legislation is—I will not use the word vicious, probably it is not necessary to say so, but I mean to say that it is derogatory to the ordinary course of finding annual supplies for the continuance of the Government to have this patching out by what are called emergency bills. We have had one for six months and now we have another one proposed to us for thirty days.

I do not mean to say that there may not be times of convenience when such bills may properly be passed. It is perfectly plain that it requires the uninfluenced approval of both Houses of Congress for the passage of a bill, and then its signature by the Executive. We have no method of coercion upon the other branch of Congress, nor have they upon us to affect us in the slightest degree, but there does come a question simply of public convenience and our own convenience whether we shall bridge over differences of opinion between the two branches of the Legislature. In that I can see no dereliction in principle if we should agree to postpone the time of trying ultimately our differences.

I am as displeased as the Senator is with this mode of providing the proper supplies for the Navy. The subject contains a good many elements which I do not care to delay the Senate to recount. I differed with the majority of the Senate as to their right to place general legislation upon an appropriation bill even under the peculiar wording of the rule of the Senate; but I understood perfectly from the Senator who had the bill in charge that when the Senate made the amendments providing for general legislation, that is to say, the increase of the Navy generally, they did not intend to do more than to present that measure, as they had once done by a separate bill, to the judgment of the House, and that their reason for presenting it a second time upon the appropriation bill was that the separate bill had been pigeon-holed and refused consideration; that their object was to reiterate the views of the Senate by presenting the bill for the immediate reconstruction of the Navy again to the House in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill, but that it was not intended that the appropriations should fail by reason of the want of the House to assent to that provision if it was necessary for the Senate to recede from their amendment.

The vote of yesterday unanimously by the Senate, if it had the meaning it should have and that my vote was intended to aid in its having, was that when a conference was raised in regard to a bill of supplies the amendments of the Senate were to be considered by those who represented the House. I did not mean to say that they were to be coerced into any agreement, but I meant to say that the amendments were to be considered and they were to be received, and that we are not called upon in silence to swallow any measure that may be brought by the House before the sense of the Senate without exercising an independent and a conscientious judgment. That was the meaning of the vote, at least I believe it was the meaning of the vote, and I hope the Senate will always vote in that way.

But we have already accepted a makeshift, a mere makeshift, and not a very good one at that, by taking the estimates of a prior year, which might be and were quite inappropriate to the requirements of the present year. That was, to say the least, a very clumsy piece of legislation; yet it saved the question of annoyance, and it practically supplied the uses of the Navy for six months' time. Now the fact is practically that we stand upon the threshold possibly of the ordinary Christmas adjournment. A very large number of the members of the House have gone away from the city, and as I look around upon the benches here I see that a great many members of the Senate have gone, supposing that the ordinary custom would be followed at the present time. While I will stand I think as long as any one for a principle, I do not see the dereliction of a principle in accepting for thirty days longer the same rule that we accepted for six months when it comes upon us in an emergency. If I am informed by any committee of conference on the part of the Senate that the House refuses to consider the amendments offered by the Senate, I will agree in reappointing that committee until the end of my term, and then we will submit the question to the American people, whose opinion after all is to control those who sit in either branch of Congress.

While I agree with my friend as to the unwisdom or viciousness, if you please to call it so, of the mode of legislation proposed, I do not see a dereliction in principle between passing a bill for thirty days when we have once agreed to do the same thing for six months.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, if I can have the ear of the Senator from Delaware, to call his attention to one fact. We passed the bill denominated an emergency bill on the last day of the last session of Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. In order to get away.

Mr. LOGAN. In order to get away. Now, when we have two months and a half before us, I hope he will not call this an emergency. When the Senator says that because the Senate through its conferees insisted on the consideration of its amendments we gave the vote which we did yesterday and the Senate will insist again provided the House conferees will not confer on that proposition, and states that to be the principle we voted on and not in reference to the character or manner of the bill, I ask him what the difference is when we appointed a committee of conference to-day, when the House appointed a committee of conference, when they have not met, and they send a bill here —

Mr. BAYARD. A separate bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; a separate bill, as they did in the case which the Senator calls an emergency. They do not meet the Senate in conference, but send us this bill, and what rule will you apply or what standard will you be gauged by in order to bring the conferees together at the time when the appropriation proposed by this bill shall expire?

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator does not the conference that we ordered unanimously yesterday stand, and will it not stand until it meets (if we adjourn now), twenty or thirty days from this time?

Mr. LOGAN. But suppose the conferees of the House do not meet? They have not met with us since they were appointed. Suppose they do not meet?

Mr. BAYARD. They were only appointed to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. There has been plenty of time to meet, but they have not met or proposed to meet. Will the Senator tell me that now, sixty days before the adjournment of the session, or when we approach within thirty days of its close, then an emergency will not be upon us for the purpose of passing the same character of bill? If the conferees do not meet, will not the same exigency exist then that exists now? I should like to know the difference. If the Senate of the United States propose that any one man in this country shall fashion the character of legislation for the Congress of the United States, and the Senators from the different States of this country will not stand up and say they will have something to do with it, they had better abdicate and admit that they no longer belong to the Congress of the United States. I look upon this not as proper legislation, not as fair legislation. I do not regard it as fair treatment to the Senate, when the House conferees do not meet with the conferees of the Senate, for the House to send continuously bills here called emergency bills to be passed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator inform me on one point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. MCPHERSON. When the bill first went into conference, speaking of the bill of last session, did the House conferees meet with the Senate conferees and consider the subjects-matter involved in the amendments?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then it is the same committee of the House and the same committee of the Senate, the same conference committee on the part of each House?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember whether the same persons are on the conference committee of the House that were on at the last session of Congress. Perhaps they are the same persons.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The point I wish to submit to the Senator is whether it is not asking a good deal to continuously insist upon it that the same committee after having once rejected a proposition shall continue to consider it? That was the inquiry I wished to make.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing whatever to do with appointing the committees of conference. The conference committee have never conferred in reference to these amendments at all except so far as the amendments in reference to the cruisers were concerned. The House refused to agree to them and the Senate adhered to their proposition. The other amendments were not considered, never have been considered, the House conferees would not consider them and they have utterly refused up to this time to consider any amendment whatever to that bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator will bear with me a moment longer. It will be remembered by him that the Senate refused to instruct their conferees to recede. The House in like manner instructed their conferees, and so both were acting under instructions. Therefore, I do not see how the conferees could have agreed if they had tried.

Mr. LOGAN. I have heard the Senator repeat the same thing, this is the third time perhaps to-day, and it is nothing new to us that the House have refused to agree and the Senate have refused to agree. We all know that. I have spoken of the character of this legislation and the manner in which the conferees representing the Senate have been, I will not say improperly treated, but the ignoring of our propositions, the refusal to consider any amendment whatever to this bill. If under the rules and under the parliamentary practice in reference to conferees considering questions the House can refuse to consider any amendments whatever to a bill that the Senate proposes, and will go back and substitute another bill for that, and insist on our passing it without amendment, I wish to ask any Senator what we have to do with legislation if we take up and accept every bill that is sent to us from the House.

Now let me put a case. Here in the Congress of the United States is a precedent being set, that by withholding a measure in committee up to the time that some emergency may be claimed to be upon us, a bill then suited to the taste of some individual or committee, without proper consideration, may be sent, and one of the Houses told, "Take this or nothing;" and you call that legislation! You call that legislating for the country! You call that examining into questions and appropriating money for different and specific purposes in a proper and legitimate way!

If it be true that this sort of legislation is to be followed as a precedent hereafter it may be that a party in power in one House or the other may, through stubbornness and design, almost entirely thwart an administration. Suppose at the next session of Congress a majority in the Senate should say, "We will not agree to your bill at all;" then you refer it to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations, having a majority disagreeing perhaps with a majority of the House, may say, "This substitute that we propose shall be considered, and nothing else." Then my friend the Senator from New Jersey will get up and insist on the rights of the Senate. I suppose you can not coerce the House; you can not coerce any legislative body. That is true. But there is proper consideration that should be given to both. We should consider fairly and properly that which is suggested by one House to the other, and neither House should say to the other, "This must be taken, or you get nothing." The time may come—I hope it never will; I certainly would not desire to be a party to it—but the time may come in the Congress of the United States when party spirit may run so high that a majority in one House or the other may refuse to agree, and force the other House either to take what they propose or nothing, and in that way thwart the intentions and proper purposes of an administration that is trying fairly to administer the affairs of this Government.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe, as I have said, in this character of legislation, nor in this manner of dealing by one House with the other. It is not fair to the Senate, and would not be fair to the House if the Senate should undertake to force upon them a character of legislation that was not consistent with their views and notions of that which was proper and right.

I only say this much as a representative, giving what I believe to be the correct principle so far as legislation is concerned, and not only that, but the proper courtesy to be extended by one House to the other and by one committee to the other.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my request for unanimous consent, as it leads to debate.

Mr. HALE. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. But below that, when this disappears what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objected to the present consideration of the bill, and, pending its being referred under the rules to the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent this discussion has gone on. The Senate now resumes the consideration of the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for an adjournment from this day to the 5th of January.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

A division was called for.

Mr. HALE. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], who, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT (when Mr. HAWLEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] being called from the city for the day, is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. My colleague will return this evening.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] on all political questions. Not regarding this as one of that nature, I vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. MITCHELL'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] as I understand.

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. He would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. HALE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONAS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. On this question, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. MCPHERSON (after having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote. My colleague [Mr. SEWELL] I see is absent, and he is paired with me generally, and I do not know now he would vote on this question.

The Secretary read the names of those voting in the affirmative and negative.

Mr. BLAIR. Is the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] called as voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee voted.

Mr. BLAIR. I made the announcement, according to my recollection, of his pair.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Bayard,	George,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,
Colquitt,	Gibson,	Jackson,	Lamar.

NAYS—25.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sheffield,
Call,	Hale,	Maxey,	Walker,
Cameron, of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Hoar,	Morgan,
Cullom,	Lapham,	Platt,
Dolph,	Logan,	Pugh,

ABSENT—43.

Allison,	Farley,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Beck,	Garland,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,
Brown,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Butler,	Harris,	Morrill,	Slater,
Camden,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	Pendleton,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Pike,	Vest,
Coke,	Jonas,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,	Williams.
Fair,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw that for a moment that I may move an executive session on some nominations which have come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion is in order but for a call of the Senate or to adjourn, no quorum being present.

Mr CULLOM. I should like to make an inquiry before the motion is put. The unfinished business of yesterday has not been taken up to-day because of this being a sort of special day. I inquire whether that will come up as the unfinished business at the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not be able to answer that question authoritatively at this moment. As no quorum is present, the Chair can make no decision upon any point. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned till Monday next at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 20, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to have the Journal corrected. It states that "leave of absence was granted WILLIAM H. HATCH for ten days on account of important business." Instead of "WILLIAM H. HATCH" it should read "HORATIO H. HATCH."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal as corrected was then approved.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I call up the unfinished business, which is the consideration of the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] calls up the special order; and the Chair can not entertain any requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. CHACE. I hope the gentleman from Texas will give me two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas withdraws his demand, of course the Chair would recognize gentlemen who wish to submit requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I should be glad to gratify all these gentlemen, but I want to get through with this bill, and I apprehend that before long we may be left without a quorum.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a Board of Commissioners of Interstate Commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

The pending question was upon the amendment offered yesterday, by Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, to strike out all of the fourth section, commencing with the word "that," in line 1, down to and including the word "and," at the beginning of line 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the amendment which I submitted last evening is to strike out in section 4 of this bill these words:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and.

I leave the latter clause of the section, which has reference to private and leased lines, that they shall form a part of the whole line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of railroad legislation. I am in favor of railroad legislation even if it does not meet my entire views. I believe the bill which was reported by the committee was the better bill. I believe there are dangerous pitfalls in this substitute introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. This section is one of the most captivating sections of the bill, but I believe it to be one of the most deadly to the interests of that part of the country which I have the honor in part to represent. I believe, sir, it is opening ratholes, as might be said, in the great granaries of this Republic—the regions that supply the food of the country. I believe that it strikes down the very interests that the most of us are here to represent, that is, the great agricultural interests of this country.

I do not need to argue this at length, for it has been admitted in debate by the friends of this very section of the bill. I call attention to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] in discussing and supporting this very section of the bill. He said:

> Let us take an occidental illustration: Here is Chicago (not the old and certainly not the new Jerusalem), with many competing lines. Here is Paradise, Pa., on the most natural and easy route between New York and Chicago. Only one line of railroad passes through it. It is only two hundred miles from New York, and yet passage or freight under existing circumstances is liable to be greater to Paradise than Chicago. Of course I know Chicago and another similar place are both reached by down grade and easier of access than Paradise, but on what idea of justice should Paradise, Pa., pay up for Chicago, Ill.? This system is very unjust to the Eastern farmer. With higher taxes, dearer land, and higher cost of production, all paid on account of proximity to the seaboard, he can not compete with those thousands of miles inland.

There is an admission that this fourth section of the bill strikes in the face the inland parts of this Republic—the parts remote from the seaboard market. It cuts down the value of every farm. It puts practically a tax on every ox, every horse, every hog, every bushel of grain raised and sold. Chicago, for the States of Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and others adjacent thereto, is the market for the farmer. If you increase the rate on long hauls from the Chicago market eastward, you tax all the products of those States. Take it, for instance, in Meadville, Pa.; and a car-load of cattle shipped from there costs $5 more than a car-load of cattle shipped from Chicago. This shows the benefits that the West derives from low rates on long hauls. You pass this fourth section of the bill and you force an increase of the rate on long hauls. Competition in the great shipments made from a point like Chicago enables them to ship at low rates. Pass this fourth section, and you increase that rate. Increase that rate and you add a tax to the products of the people of my district. You not only do so in shipping our products to the East, but you also do so when you bring your manufactures from the East. Clothing and merchandise of all kinds brought from the East get the benefit of the same principle, and you put a tax on the people when you land those goods at the doors of the consumers and producers in my State. For, sir, it works both ways: it is an injury to the consumers of the East, and it is a disadvantage to the producers of the West.

Mr. Speaker, I say this, that while I conscientiously believe any gentleman on this floor is warranted in voting against this entire bill because of that fourth section, so earnestly do I desire legislation on this general subject even if I can not carry my amendment, I believe

I am prepared to vote for this bill. I appeal to gentlemen in this House to recognize the fact that the people do demand legislation. It is not true, in my opinion, as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], that they are content. They are not content. Every legislative body in this country has been an intellectual battlefield for years where the people have fought for the regulation of railroads, and those struggles have brought down rates of transportation as much perhaps as the natural law referred to by my always eloquent friend from New Jersey.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to endeavor to answer the argument just submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, and I the more desire to do so because I regard him as a fair man. I think his judgment must be controlled by some sort of facts different from those really presented by the bill before the House, and which induce him to take the position that he does.

What are the facts presented? This bill simply proposes that more shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance on the same amount and kind of freight on any single railroad. What objection can there be to that? What does the gentleman want? Does he want to have his freights carried from Iowa to New York at less rate than it could be carried for one hundred or two hundred miles on that line of road? If he does, if he wants freights carried below any compensating rates to the railroads, does he not demand simply that other people living upon the line of the road shall pay the difference in the freight between what are the compensating rates to the company and those which he himself is compelled to pay?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask him——

Mr. REAGAN. I must decline in five minutes to yield to an interruption.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is it not true that farmers in Pennsylvania have farms worth $150 an acre, while in Iowa they are worth from but $25 to $50, and is there not a compensation to those Pennsylvania farmers by living in nearer proximity to the markets?

Mr. REAGAN. I hope I will not be interrupted in violation of the rule. I have declined to yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to be interrupted, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore alluded to this subject in the general discussion of this bill, and have endeavored to combat the extraordinary assumption that one of the duties of the railroad companies is to equalize the profits of the people.

Why, sir, if we submit to them in this matter we submit to them the entire commerce of the country, and the interests of the people are placed directly under their control. We can not afford to do it. Their business is the transportation of products and not the equalization of business, nor the regulation of private fortunes or the investments of capital. That is not what they were chartered for. The real question is, and there is no escaping from it by the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman, that the object had in view is to arrange so that freights for a longer distance shall not be carried for less than a compensating rate to the railroads, and the people between the terminal points be required to make up the difference by paying an extra cost for the carrying of their freights for shorter distances over the same line. There is nothing in this bill requiring the railroads to charge more for carrying freights than there is now. They can control that question just as they do now, and establish a fair compensating rate for the service performed. What more, I would ask, can possibly be desired than that?

There is, however, an equity connected with the subject. Suppose you allow these unjust rates to be charged; then you compel the people at other points on the line to pay your freight. That discriminates in favor of one locality and against another. You enrich certain favorite individuals at the expense of others; you build up localities and impoverish others; you make one town a city by the unlawful action of the railroads, while you destroy the commerce and prosperity of another by the same unlawful action.

Instead of the discrimination being made as the gentleman from Iowa suggests, it is a discrimination by the bill against excessive charges for short hauls; that is all. The gentleman from Iowa objects because he would leave it in the power of the railroad companies to charge as much for one-tenth of the distance as they do for the whole distance, or for one-fourth or one-half of it as for any other portion of the length of the line.

Now, while they can not carry as cheaply per ton per mile for a short haul as for a long haul, as the same handling takes place for both, they can charge as much on the long haul, and it puts the short haul at a disadvantage by subjecting it to the full amount of freights that would be charged upon a long haul. We said it is not equitable, but we can not get a better rule that is equitable in favor of long hauls, and hence adopted this provision.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the people of the West are asking the governors of their respective States to call their Legislatures together to take action with regard to the condition of transportation. If the petitions should be acceded to the State Legislatures can only deal with about one-fifth of the transportation problems, as four-fifths of the carrying is interstate in its character. Congress must regulate interstate commerce or it will not be regulated. For many years we have been asked to do it and nothing has been done. The present distress and consequent agitation surely deserve our earnest attention. No two members agree exactly upon details on this question. A minority is sure not to get what it wants in any bill. But I am resolved to vote for the judgment of the majority in the faith that as the bill progresses through its several stages in both Houses it may be perfected. This is the preliminary stage, and it has to go through many; it will come back to the House, and final voting will then take place. I have no sympathy with attempts to destroy the bill or hinder its progress.

With regard to the bills before the House, I am sure that neither is free from grave objection. The fourth section now being considered, to prevent more for a short than a long haul, is right nine times out of ten. Schedules are based upon it, because distance is one factor in arranging rates; but the rule has exceptions, and provision should be made for them, and no act can be so framed as to do it. The law should have brains in it; an executive hand to moderate it; eyes to see and ears to hear. The feature of the same section that prohibits more for a short haul than a longer one for a similar amount and kind of property would permit the worst discriminations now complained of in the West. A shipper who bills two cars could get a different rate from the shipper who bills one car, and thereby get a monopoly of local business. Our transportation is dual in its nature—a local business that should be looked at from a local standpoint, and a through business that should be considered from a through standpoint. Train-loads of goods are sent from the West and at a lower rate by the hundred-weight than single hundred-weights from a point near the seaboard to the seaboard. We can not frame a statute that will fairly apply to the hundred-weight a short distance and the train-load a long distance.

Wholesaling has grown up very rapidly in Iowa. The application of distance as the greatest factor in transportation will destroy every wholesale establishment in the State. It will take our factories for packing pork and condensing other products to Chicago. Time may enable Congress to frame a statute that will apply to both local and through commerce, but we have not found it yet. We should try to prevent unjust discriminations, unfair rebates, injurious pooling, and extortionate rates, but we are sadly at variance how to frame the act that will do it. I think we should give the people an arbitration board, where their complaints should be heard and determined—a place where poor men can go without retaining a lawyer—an arbitration board, that will hear at once and act promptly. It is no use to send a man with a ten-dollar grievance to the courts. Few have sought that form of redress in the past, although the courts have been open. Few will resort to them in the future. There are but two ways to give redress—either by an arbitration without expense or by a lawsuit with it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore, in a former Congress, spoken at length on the subject of regulating interstate commerce, and at that time discussed the section of the bill now under consideration, and gave some reasons why I thought it should not be adopted. I have seen no reason since to change the opinions then expressed, although the section has been amended, so that it is not now limited to a car-load, as it was at that time.

I do not agree fully with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] who has just taken his seat when he says that in ninety-nine cases in a hundred the provision in this section is right. I am of the opinion that if this section should become the law it would operate injuriously in a much larger proportion of cases. I believe it would operate injuriously to the people whom I have the honor to represent, as well as those of other sections of Illinois. In the district where I reside our railroads terminate at Chicago, and our produce is shipped to that city. Chicago is the market largely for what we buy or sell. Certainly the larger part of what we buy or sell is shipped to or from that city, and we complain that we have to pay higher rates than those who live at greater distances west of us; and it is true that we oftentimes pay more to Chicago—only about one hundred miles distant—than we do from Chicago to New York, or from Chicago to Philadelphia or Baltimore. Now, I do not see how this section can possibly benefit us. Freight rates from my district to Chicago can not be affected by any provision of this bill, the railroads fixing such rates for transportation being wholly within the State.

This, Mr. Speaker, is really one of the difficulties in our way in attempting to legislate on the subject of regulating railway transportation by Congress. There are many sections of the country where the people are in the same situation as my constituents. Take the people of New York who ship to New York city, or to Albany, or to Buffalo; take the people of New Jersey who ship to Jersey City, or the people of Pennsylvania who ship to Philadelphia, and these are the people who have complained most of unjust discriminations, of the lower rates for transportation from longer distances; and such instances may be pointed out in many other parts of the country. These people in such cases can not, as it seems to me, be benefited by this provision, as their transportation by railroad is largely within the State, and is not therefore interstate; and if they are subjected to unjust discriminations or to unreasonable or exorbitant freight charges, they must rely upon State legislation largely, if not entirely, for relief. Now, while we complain of freight charges to Chicago, we have cheaper rates from Chicago to the Atlantic seaboard, and the effect of this bill, if it has any effect at all, will be, as I believe, to increase charges from Chicago east, and from all other points where there exists the competition of numerous railroads and, at the same time, that of the cheaper transportation by water; and such points are too numerous to mention.

I know, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas says that this provision does not require railroads to charge more than they are now charging for the longer distances, but will they not be compelled to do so? In many cases they may be compelled to charge more or otherwise carry nothing. He says they can still carry for the same. But may they not be compelled to carry even for less, and for a rate which is not remunerative or which is unreasonably low? And if so, then I can not for the life of me see why they may not when they get beyond the point of such severe competition charge a reasonable rate, even though it may be more than that charged for a longer distance. I admit that as a rule it is unjust to charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance or to charge a different price for the same distance; and I would be willing to make such charges prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination. But there are many cases where, in my opinion, railroads may be justified in charging more for the same or for a shorter distance, and when it would be an absolute injustice to forbid such charges. I do not believe, therefore, that any such iron rule should be adopted as this section provides.

The supreme court of the State of Illinois in a well-considered case, where the complaint was that the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company had charged more for a shorter than it had for a longer distance, held that the Legislature should amend the act to prevent unjust discriminations and extortions in the rates to be charged by the different railroads in the State for the transportation of freight on said roads, so as to make the charging of a greater compensation for a less distance, or for the same distance, merely prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination, instead of conclusive evidence as such act made it. In the opinion of the court in that case it is said:

That the naked fact that a railway company charges a larger sum for transporting freight of the same class over a given distance than it is charging for the same distance over another part of its road, or in the opposite direction, is not of itself conclusive evidence of an unjust discrimination, will be manifest on a moment's consideration. Take, for instance, the road of the appellant with one terminus at Chicago and the other at East Saint Louis. At one season of the year more freights are moving from Chicago toward East Saint Louis than in the opposite direction. The consequence, of course, is, that the supply of empty cars at the latter point will be in excess of the demand. There is a water route between these points, which also touches several intermediate stations upon the road. Now, unless the railway company is permitted under such circumstances to induce shipments over its line by lowering its freights, it is evident that a portion of its cars will return empty. This would, of course, necessitate a higher charge for freight moving toward Saint Louis than it would be necessary to impose if return freights could be secured by lowering the rates on the return trip. To forbid the company to lower the rates of return freight would thus benefit no one, and would work an injury both to the company and to the people along the line.

That illustration is given, the court say, for the purpose of showing that a difference of price for the same distance of transportation is not necessarily an unjust discrimination, and that any law must be fatally defective which infers guilt as a conclusive presumption from the mere fact of difference of rates, without permitting the companies to show why the different rates were adopted.

It occurs to me that the reasoning of the court will apply with as much weight to the section under consideration, for if railway companies are compelled, from the competitive point, to carry at a very low rate in order to carry anything, it does seem but just to allow them to charge a reasonable rate from other points when you get beyond such competition.

I am opposed to this provision as much for what it permits as for what it forbids. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says this provision allows railroad companies to charge as much for any part of the distance over their roads as they charge for the whole distance. But why permit them to do that? Why permit them to charge as much from Albany to Boston as they do from Buffalo to Boston? Why permit them to charge as much from Fort Wayne to Chicago as they do from Pittsburgh to Chicago? And if you permit them to charge as much from Fort Wayne to Chicago as they do from Pittsburgh to Chicago, or from Albany to Boston as they do from Buffalo to Boston, would it not seem just to allow them to charge more from Crestline to Chicago than from Fort Wayne, where it is more than double the distance, or from Rochester, N. Y., to Boston than from Albany for the same reason? It seems so to me.

This, Mr. Speaker, shows the absurdity of the rule, that it is not a just rule. It would, in my opinion, be a far better rule to permit no unreasonable or exorbitant charges to be made under any circumstances from any point. I am certainly in favor, Mr. Speaker, of any proper legislation to protect the people from any and all unjust discriminations and from any and all unreasonable and exorbitant freight charges; and I would make it the duty of the Government to enforce the law. But I do not believe the rule embraced in this section is either wise or just; and, in my judgment, it should not be adopted as an absolute rule to govern in all cases and under all circumstances.

The following remarks made by me in the Forty-sixth Congress on the provisions of this section, which, however, were then limited to a car-load, but are now made general as to all freights, being applicable, are hereby appended as a part of my remarks:

And now, Mr. Chairman, as to the fourth section of the proposed substitute, which makes it unlawful to charge or receive any greater compensation per car-load of similar property for carrying the same for a shorter than for a longer distance, I will say that such provision does not commend itself to my judgment at all. I know that many members of this House approve of that section of the proposed substitute, and insist that it is right in principle. They tell you with great confidence that every man of common sense knows that it does not cost any more to carry freight of any kind a shorter than it does for a longer distance, and that it is a wrong and an outrage to do so. I know this seems to be very plausible indeed, but I assert here that no such rule can be applied to railroads engaged in carrying interstate commerce indiscriminately without doing in many cases absolute wrong and injustice; and it does seem to me not to require much examination and reflection to satisfy any one of the truth of this statement. The rule might be a just rule, and I think it would be, if there were no controlling influences to prevent a railroad from charging at its terminal points a reasonable rate for the transportation of property. Then, and in that case, you might insist that no greater charge should be made for a shorter than for a longer distance. But such is not the case, as every one knows. Take Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and many other cities where there are numerous railway lines running to the seaboard, all competing not only with each other but with the cheaper water transportation, and there are times when the strife for the carrying trade between these competing lines, lines constructed and run as far as may be in the interest of rival cities, each striving to build up its own commerce or to maintain its own commercial supremacy, is so great that railways are compelled by this high competition to carry for less than a reasonable rate, for less than a living rate; and then I ask every candid, fair-minded man in this House, is it just to say that because a railway is thus compelled to carry for less than a reasonable rate, or living rate, from the point of such high competition in order to carry anything, that it should not be allowed to charge a reasonable rate, or living rate, from intermediate points where there is no competition whatever, even though such charge be more than was charged for a longer distance on the same line of transportation? I know it is said that if railroads carry from terminal points for less than cost they should not be allowed to make up their losses by exorbitant charges on local freights; in other words, that unreasonably high local rates should not be permitted to compensate for unreasonably low through rates; and that proposition I do not object to. I maintain, however, that unreasonable, extortionate rates should not be permitted anywhere on any railroad; and I insist that the question to be considered should be, what is a reasonable charge from the given point, and not what is charged from some other point.

It is admitted by all who are conversant with the subject that freight can be carried for much less by water than by rail. Some say for one-fourth, and certainly it can be carried for one-half by water that it can be by rail. God made the rivers, the lakes, and the ocean, and the Government dredges the bars, removes the snags and the rocks, and deepens the channels, and all the expense the carrier by water is at is the expense of building his boats and running them, while the construction of the railway costs millions to those who carry by rail, to which millions more may be added for rolling-stock, locomotives, and cars, and the expense of operating them. Hence water transportation is by far the cheaper, and railroads that have to compete with water lines of transportation are compelled to carry at the very lowest possible rates; and when you add to that the competition of numerous other railway lines, each striving for business, the rates for carrying freight are in many cases reduced so low that any one can see that to prohibit a railway company, under such circumstances, from charging more from some other point where there is no such competition, and where the shipper has no such advantages as exist at the competing point or points, would be absolutely unjust and ruinous to such company. This is the case at Chicago, and this is the case at Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and very many other cities where competition runs high and railways are striving for business.

My colleague [Mr. SPARKS], who delivered a speech on this subject some weeks since in the House, who approves of the fourth section of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and who thinks it tersely and admirably drawn, said in his speech:

"From Saint Louis pointing east there are five important railway lines, which of themselves and in combination with other roads forming their eastern connections are through lines to the great business centers on the Atlantic seaboard. These railways all pass through the district or parts of the district in Illinois which I have the honor to represent in this House. * * * That district of country is devoted mainly to agriculture, and the productions principally wheat and corn. These crops, together with flour, quite extensively manufactured there, constitute the great bulk of its exports, 90 per cent. of which is destined for the markets of the East, such as Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston."

He further said that his home was at Carlyle, a way station on the Ohio and Mississippi Railway, forty-seven miles east of Saint Louis; and then shows that in the month of November last freight rates were more from Carlyle to Philadelphia, Boston, and New York than from East Saint Louis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are not only the five important railway lines running east from Saint Louis through my colleague's district, but there are competing water ways by way of New Orleans and Chicago, and I would say to him that these five railway lines are compelled necessarily to compete not only with each other, but with these several lines of transportation by water when they leave Saint Louis; and as the proposed substitute for the bill under consideration, which my colleague approves, forbids all poolings of freights and combinations of railways for that purpose, and seeks by legislation to compel competition, and, as he said in his speech, "when railroad companies declare war against each other, during the continuance of such war, at the terminal and intersecting points their tariff rates are in many cases reduced to ridiculously and ruinously low amounts," I would ask him whether if the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company under such circumstances should be compelled by such a war, or by great competition, to reduce its tariff of rates to a ruinously low amount, it should be compelled to charge ruinously low rates at every other point where there is no competition whatever? There can be no good reason given, it occurs to me, why such railroad may not under such circumstances justly charge a fair and reasonable rate from such other points where there is no competition. My colleague says again that on the Pacific Railway, six hundred miles east of San Francisco, shippers are compelled to ship their freights at local rates west to San Francisco, and then ship them back over the same line in order to get the best rates. And this seems to be a great wrong.

But why is this, Mr. Chairman? How does it come that this seeming wrong is perpetrated? It is of course because the Pacific Railroad when it leaves San Francisco must compete with transportation by ocean, which is much cheaper; for the railroad was constructed at immense expense, and if it is compelled to carry freight from San Francisco for less than a remunerative or reasonable rate by reason of the cheaper transportation by ocean, I would like to have my colleague, or any other gentleman, give me any good reason why a reasonable or remunerative rate should not be permitted at other points east of San Francisco. While no exorbitant charge, no unreasonable or extortionate charge, should be allowed anywhere, it seems to me to be unreasonable to attempt to give people who live ten, twenty, or a hundred miles away from water transportation the benefits he would have if living by it. With as much reason you might as well try to put the man who lives twenty miles away from navigable water, or a railway station, on an equality with the man whose farm is near by.

The same complaints are made in regard to Chicago rates and local rates east of Chicago that are made as to Saint Louis, San Francisco, and many other places. And why? Because Chicago has water transportation by the lakes and by the Erie Canal, and by the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to the Gulf and the ocean. And in addition to these cheaper lines of water transportation, there are numerous railway lines leading to the seaboard and to rival commercial cities striving to build up their commerce, if not to maintain commercial supremacy. Now if with all these competing lines of transportation striving for business, and especially during a war among railway lines, a railway company is compelled, in order to do any business, to carry at unreasonable or ruinously low rates, I am wholly unable to see any wrong or injustice in permitting such railway company to charge from any station on its line east of Chicago a reasonable rate, even if such charge should be greater for the shorter than is made from Chicago, where the advantages of all these competing lines exist, and which would be a longer distance. And the same thing may be said of numerous other cities and places all over the country.

I would ask, Mr. Chairman, why this fourth section, so much commended, permits a railroad company to charge as much for the shorter as it does for the longer distance? We are told that under this section the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway Company may charge as much from Crestline to Pittsburgh as it does from Chicago to Pittsburgh. And so a railroad company may charge as much from Albany to Boston as it does from Buffalo to Boston. Of course, to do this the company must charge as much at every intermediate station between Chicago and Crestline as it does from Chicago, and the same from Buffalo to Albany, and this fourth section permits that to be done. It does not seek to regulate or control charges in any way; it permits a railway company to charge what it pleases for its services. And when it fixes a through rate from its terminal points, whether such through rate be high or low, it permits the high rate to be continued at every intermediate station all the way to the end of the line, and also requires that the low rate shall not be exceeded at any intermediate station on the line. Why is this permitted? And may not the circumstances which would justify charging the same for a shorter distance than is done for a longer be of such character as to justify charging more in some cases for the shorter than is done for the longer distance? It seems so to me, and I am satisfied that the only just rule that can be adopted, both for the interest of the shipper, of the people who are interested in cheap transportation, and of railway owners, is to require railway companies to carry at reasonable rates from all points and for all distances. And I ask, Mr. Chairman, why, if you are permitted to charge as much from Crestline to Pittsburgh as you do from Chicago to Pittsburgh, you may not be allowed to charge a little more from, say, Fort Wayne, which is from one to two hundred miles farther from Pittsburgh than Crestline?

The fact is the rule that a railway shall not under any circumstances charge more for a shorter than is at the same time charged for a longer distance is not a just rule. There are many cases where it seems to me a railway company may without any injustice be permitted to charge more for the shorter distance. Take the railway lines that necessarily have to compete with the cheaper water transportation, as from Louisville, Ky., to Memphis, Tenn. That line must compete with the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The railway lines from Pittsburgh, from Wheeling, from Bellaire, and Parkersburg to Cincinnati, and from Cincinnati to Saint Louis must compete with the Ohio River, and with the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. And in these and many other cases the railway lines may, I think, be permitted justly to charge more for the shorter distance after leaving the point of competition with water transportation, provided always the charge be a reasonable charge. Nor is it entirely clear that under some circumstances a railway line may not without any injustice be permitted to charge more for the shorter distance even without reference to competition. Take the case of Carlyle, Ill., mentioned by my friend and colleague from Illinois, forty-seven miles east of Saint Louis. This fourth section only applies to a car-load. Where does the car come from to Carlyle? The probabilities are that it comes from Saint Louis and is hauled empty to Carlyle, and you not only have to stop to leave the car, but it must remain there for a time and you must then stop your train to get it again, and so it may have been better and cheaper for the railway company to have hauled the car loaded all the way from Saint Louis.

I am led to believe, Mr. Chairman, that the proposed fourth section has grown out of complaints that railway lines are discriminating in their freight charges in favor of the West. In New York it is made a matter of complaint that the New York Central and the New York and Erie Railroads discriminate against the people of that State, and charge them more proportionately than they do the people of the West. It is the same thing in Pennsylvania with the Pennsylvania Railroad, and perhaps the same charges may be made against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Mr. Thurber, an intelligent gentleman of New York, connected with the board of trade and transportation of that city, who takes a deep interest in the passage of the substitute proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is reported to have said, in speaking of the great wrongs which have been perpetrated upon the people of the State of New York by railroads, that—

"It is wrong that the farmers of this State [New York] should be charged for transporting their produce a rate proportionately three or four hundred per cent. higher than those of the Mississippi Valley."

This same complaint is made by many others. I have in my hand a paper entitled Public Opinion, containing extracts from a number of newspapers published in New York and Pennsylvania, and perhaps some other States, in relation to this question of railway transportation. I presume other members have received it as well as myself, and on looking over these extracts I find many of them complaining of this discrimination in favor of the West and against the people of New York. One newspaper, the Evening Express, says:

"The present system of railway discrimination virtually puts every farmer in New York west of the Mississippi."

The Lake Shore News says:

"The Central road alone has made poor men of thousands of New York farmers by reducing transportation from the West to a figure lower than it can be had from this State to New York."

And the same paper quotes from the report of the committee of nine appointed by the Legislature of New York to investigate the methods of railway management, as follows:

"The charge that the railroads of this State discriminate against the citizens of the State [New York] and in favor of Western and foreign producers is fully proven by the evidence taken."

The Patriot and Gazette says:

"The discrimination against our own State [New York] is telling heavily on the farmers. Their lands have declined very largely and are still declining. With the most rigid economy and with the most exacting labor, they are constantly growing poorer and poorer. If a barrel of flour can be carried from Chicago to the seaboard cheaper than it can be carried from Oswego, then wheat at Oswego is not worth as much as it is at Chicago."

And then asks the following question:

"Shall the railroads be so perverted as to be made to build up Illinois at the expense of New York, or shall it be made to prove a benefit and a blessing to the State from which it derives all of its power?"

The same paper (Patriot and Gazette) in another extract says:

"The railroads of this State are carrying freight from the West at rates far below those charged on all the above productions of this State, and the result is no farmer or manufacturer is able to hold his own against the competition from the West, aided as it is by the low rates of freight there obtained."

And then states that while flour is carried by all rail from Milwaukee to New York for 36 cents per barrel, the charge from Rochester to New York is 30 cents.

The Long Island Farmer says:

"Grain, flour, butter, and cheese are brought from the Mississippi Valley to New York, twelve hundred miles, for less than half the freight exacted from farmers living within one hundred and fifty miles of the city, thus practically removing their farms one thousand miles farther from the market, subjecting them to a portion of the expenses for transporting the products of the West, and reducing by one-third the cash value of their land."

The Yonkers Statesman says:

"Our railroads are being run in the interests of the Western States."

And then repeats the exact language already quoted from the Patriot and Gazette, only substituting "Yonkers" for Oswego.

I might go on and multiply these quotations, but those already referred to are quite sufficient to show that there is a very general feeling in New York that the railways in that State are discriminating in favor of the West; that the people of the Mississippi Valley are getting cheaper transportation than the people of the State of New York, and the same feeling exists in Pennsylvania and other Eastern States to a great extent. But if it be true, I ask, in all candor, why do the railways of New York, or of Pennsylvania, or of Maryland discriminate in favor of the West? Why do they carry the produce of the Mississippi Valley to the seaboard so much cheaper, proportionately, than they do the produce of the States which give them their very existence? Is it because they love the people of the West better than the people who gave them all their rights and privileges that they thus discriminate in favor of the West and against their own States? It may be these railways wrong the people of their own States which have conferred upon them their franchises; and, if so, I certainly would not defend the wrong nor attempt any apology for it. But whether the people of New York and of Pennsylvania and other Eastern States are charged too much or not, I am very certain railroad companies do not carry for lower rates from the Mississippi Valley than they are compelled to do.

Fortunately for the people of the West and of the Mississippi Valley their products are not compelled to pass over one line of transportation and to pay tribute to it. They have many lines of railway transportation competing with each other; and what is better and more favorable for them, they have lines of water transportation by the Mississippi River and by the lakes so much cheaper than by rail that these railways are compelled to do whatever they do in the way of giving to the people of the West cheaper transportation. Now, I have believed, and still believe, that the intention and the effect of this fourth section, which prohibits railway companies from charging more for a shorter than they do for a longer distance, is to compel such companies to charge higher through rates and lower local rates, and that it will increase the cost of transportation to the people of the West rather than lessen or cheapen it; and for that reason I oppose the section and believe that it would operate injuriously to the people I represent and to the entire West. And knowing, Mr. Chairman, that the New York Board of Trade and Transportation is anxious to maintain the commercial supremacy of New York, I would say to the members of that board, and especially to Mr. Thurber, that the commerce of New York can not be built up and the commercial supremacy of that city maintained by compelling the people of the Mississippi Valley to pay higher rates of transportation. If you do that, you drive them out of the market, or else you drive them down the Mississippi River by way of New Orleans; and in either case, whatever the railway companies suffer by loss of through traffic, has to be made up in some way by charging higher rates on local traffic. This is inevitable unless their receipts are already larger than they should be or you drive them into bankruptcy.

But the people of the West do not understand they are so highly favored with cheap railway transportation. There are many and loud complaints in the State in which I live of railway extortion, and the people there will be surprised to learn how greatly they have been benefited by cheap transportation. The same complaints are made in the district which I represent of high local rates; and it is undoubtedly true that my constituents, only from one hundred to one hundred and seventy-five miles from Chicago, are compelled often to pay more to or from that city than is charged for four or five times the distance east of Chicago. One gentleman writes me that he paid last fall $18 for a car-load of coal from Pittsburgh to Chicago and $28 for the same car from Chicago to his residence, the latter place being only about one hundred miles, while the former distance is, say five hundred miles. Now, if $18 is a reasonable charge from Pittsburgh to Chicago, five hundred miles, $28 is certainly an unreasonable charge from Chicago to Van Orin, one hundred miles. But Congress can give no relief for such wrongful or extortionate charges to my constituents, because our railways are State railways and terminate at Chicago, within the State of Illinois, and are therefore beyond the reach of national legislation.

And again, the people of Illinois complain also that the people of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska are getting much cheaper transportation proportionately to Chicago than they do, and that our own railways are discriminating against Illinois and in favor of those States; and without doubt the railways of Illinois are carrying for cheaper rates proportionately for the people of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska than they are for the people of Illinois, especially those in Illinois who are not favored in any way by competing lines. This discrimination against the people of Illinois may be very unjust, and if so the injustice should be remedied. But to a great extent it grows out of the fact that Saint Louis, on the Mississippi River, and Chicago, on Lake Michigan, are two great rival commercial cities, and have each numerous railway lines reaching out into the States lying west of the Mississippi and of the Missouri Rivers, which compete with each other and with the rivers named for the carrying business. It is this competition, as any one can see, that gives to the people of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska cheaper transportation than the people of Illinois enjoy, and not any particular love the railway companies have for them. I do not object to the people of those States getting cheap transportation; but I do want my own constituents also to have cheap transportation; and while they are now subjected to high local rates to Chicago, I protest against any rule which would deprive them of the low rates which, by reason of the competition of numerous lines of transportation by railroad and by water, railway companies are now compelled to give them east of Chicago. And that, in my opinion, would be the effect of the fourth section of the proposed substitute.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, this question has been discussed by, I suppose, twenty members in the general debate; and I think it is fully understood. I must move, therefore, to limit the debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to occupy a few minutes on this question before the debate is closed.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire the attention of the gentleman from Texas for a moment. I ask him to permit me to call up a privileged subject—the conference report on the bill making temporary provision for the naval service.

Mr. REAGAN. I cheerfully yield. The gentleman has the right to call that subject up at any rate.

Mr. RANDALL. I know I have the right, but I think it due to the gentleman to bring the question up with his consent. I ask the Clerk to read the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 7510, making temporary provision for the naval service, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
JOHN S. LONG,
Managers on the part of the House.
EUGENE HALE,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement of the House conferees which accompanies this report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying conference report:

The conference committee having been unable to agree, the bill remains in the same condition as when last considered by the House.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. S. HOLMAN,
JOHN D. LONG,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that the differences between the two Houses in reference to this appropriation bill should be the occasion of any feeling. I believe rather that we should have an intelligent investigation into those differences, and then we shall be justified in some degree of firmness in the direction of what we may consider to be right.

I am free to say that in my view the position of the House conferees in reference to this bill was not fairly stated in the Senate yesterday; and, therefore, I will now express what I think is the unanimous voice of the House conferees as to the position we maintained in the conference.

It is well known that during the last six months the Navy Department has been administered under what is known as a temporary appropriation. The passage of a bill making a similar temporary appropriation for the next six months was objected to on the part of the Senate. It was then the House conferees said that, having no desire to make a lump appropriation, we would in this bill make a recital of every item from which the support of the Navy has been derived during the six months now almost closed. In other words, to make our provision perfectly plain, we were ready to agree upon a bill based on the existing law, and not based upon a bill which never in fact received the full approval of either House. We were willing to consider each item in its order, making reduction if it should appear in any case that for the last six months more money than was necessary had been given, or, on the other hand, increasing the appropriation if a sufficient sum had not heretofore been given. But we adhered strictly to the position that the Navy Department during the next six months of this fiscal year should be run in the same manner and with the same amount of money as during the last six months.

Thus we would consider the item of "pay of the Navy," for which we appropriated for the first six months of the current fiscal year $1,857,075, that being one-half the amount required for the full year 1884. In the same way we would appropriate for "miscellaneous pay." Next would come "contingent expenses of the Navy;" next the "pay of the Marine Corps," "provisions for the Marine Corps," "clothing for the Marine Corps," "fuel for the Marine Corps," "military stores for the Marine Corps," "transportation and recruiting for the Marine Corps," "repairs of barracks," "forage for horses," and all the various items relating to that service. So in the same way we would take up by items the appropriations for the Naval Academy. Then we would take up the Bureau of Navigation, considering each item with reference to the administration of the existing law; then the Bureau of Ordnance, then the Bureau of Yards and Docks, then the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, then the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, then the Bureau of Construction and Repair, then the Bureau of Steam-Engineering. There was, in addition to the usual appropriations for the naval establishment, in the law for the current six months appropriations for the "increase of the Navy," which we gave in full, so as to complete the cruisers that were partially built and under contract, and for their armament.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Pardon me for a moment and I will yield for that purpose, but I just now wish to make a connected statement.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the Senate conferees desired we should make the basis of our conference a bill that was passed by the House and amended by the Senate, but which was finally laid aside and never became a law. And I want to illustrate to the House the effect of going into conference on that proposition. It would be based upon an increase of the appropriation to the Navy approaching more than five millions of money. But, sir, I gave that statement once before, and will not now detain the House by repeating it, and will ask the privilege to have it inserted in my printed remarks. It is as follows:

The bill providing for current expenses of the Navy, January 1 to June 30, 1885, as passed the House, appropriates	$6,734,717 11
That bill as amended by the Senate gives for the same purposes	7,204,358 83
Being an increase of	469,641 72
The Senate on the same bill also gives for increase of the Navy	4,700,000 00
Total increase over House bill	5,169,641 72
The bill as passed the House last session gave for current expenses (one-half)	6,318,521 33
That bill as amended by the Senate gave for current expenses (one-half)	7,126,001 33
The bill just passed the Senate is in excess as follows (not including increase of Navy, $4,700,000):
Over same bill as it passed the House	$469,641 72
Over the bill as passed the House last session	885,837 50
Over the House bill as amended by the Senate last session	78,357 50

The effect of proceeding as the Senate desired us to do would bring into conference other new subjects not legislated upon until the last session of Congress.

We have here a board provided for to determine the merits of coal in reference to its capacity for producing steam; we have also a proposition to revive the gun-foundery board, neither of which was touched in the law last year; and in the third place a provision directing the Secretary of the Navy to report to Congress plans for the construction of an armored vessel. That new legislation of the Senate bill is as follows:

The coal or other fuel for the Navy purchased under this appropriation shall be of the kind which may be preferred by the Secretary of the Navy, after an investigation by a suitable board of officers of the comparative merits of anthracite and bituminous coal and of other fuel for ordinary naval uses, and the price of said coals and of other fuel, and the readiness with which they may be procured in the ports of the world.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived, to report to Congress, on the first day of the next ensuing session, a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit, and to report the full and detailed estimate for the cost of the work aforesaid, and whether the same can be better and more economically performed in establishments owned by the Government, or by private contract, or by a combined system whereby the said work can be accomplished partly by the Government and partly by private contract, and in what annual installments the said appropriations can most economically be made.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to report to Congress, at its next regular session, a plan or plans for the construction of one armored vessel for the United States Navy of not exceeding 8,500 tons displacement, the cost of the same, with machinery and armament, and time which the process of construction of such vessel would take.

Neither one of those subjects was legislated upon, as I have already stated, by Congress at the last session; neither one of those three items was contained in the bill as it passed; and yet, sir, the Secretary of the Navy, as I am advised, has proceeded to execute those three provisions although the legislation asked on those three subjects was refused by the action of the House at the last session.

The items of appropriations which would be forced into the conference by the Senate if we acceded to their request would embrace the following items; these are the items of appropriations in the Senate amendment not in the House bill:

Compass-testing house	$7,000 00
Manufacture of modern guns	100,000 00
Machine-guns	75,980 00
Construction or purchase of torpedo boat	55,000 00
For the construction of three cruisers, one dispatch vessel, four gun-boats, and three torpedo boats	2,500,000 00

I see there is an intimation on the part of one of the Senate conferees that possibly the Senate might yield that point for the construction of cruisers.

For procuring tools for constructing ships	$150,000 00
For completing the Mohican	50,000 00
For continuing work on the monitors	2,000,000 00
Total amount of new items proposed by the Senate and not in the House bill, nor for which expenditures have been made during the first six months	4,937,980 00
The bill as it is amended by the Senate appropriates an excess over the bill as it passed the House of	5,169,641 72

My experience of conferences is that when it comes to a controversy about differences in amounts of money the House generally has to give away at least one-half. And if we had acceded to the consideration of the bill as the Senate conferees had desired, the result in all human probability would have been that $2,000,000 or more of money would have been added to the appropriation for the coming six months beyond the amount which the two branches of Congress with the approval of the President gave for the support of the Navy for the first six months of the present fiscal year.

In addition it was stated, Mr. Speaker, that the other differences, leaving out the cruisers, were rather of minor importance, both in the object as well as the amount appropriated. Let me state them to see whether they are minor in amount or in importance.

The Senate amendment to the bill states in detail the appropriations for the Navy for the next six months, and the amount for each item of expenditure is arrived at and fixed by deducting from the amount proposed by the Senate amendments to the naval bill last session the sum appropriated by the bill providing for the six months ending December 31, 1884. This method would disproportion the expenditures for the first six to those for the last six months thus:

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, first six months	$400,000
Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, last six months	450,000

Here would be an excess of $50,000 for the next six over the last six months.

Bureau of Yards and Docks, first six months	$110,000
Bureau of Yards and Docks, last six months	140,000

That would be an excess of $30,000.

Bureau of Construction and Repairs, first six months	$550,000
Bureau of Construction and Repairs, last six months	850,000

Here is an increase of $300,000.

Bureau of Steam-Engineering, first six months	$500,000
Bureau of Steam-Engineering, last six months	550,000

Here is an increase of $50,000.

Now, what we wanted in conference on the part of the House conferees was to take the existing law for the last six months and if necessary repeat by items the same for the next six months against any lump appropriation.

This relieves the bill of all disproportion in the appropriations for the first six months of the current year as compared with the second six months, and makes it plain. It restricts the officials at the Navy Department so that they can not do as has been alleged and as is apprehended—that is, mak eany expenditures except for the distinct purposes enumerated in each separate item which I have recited. And in addition the proceeding as indicated by the House would be in such harmonious relation in the administration of the Department as would make the two divisions of the year run together in perfect unison, not only on the books of the Department but also in the administration of its affairs.

That is the difference between the Houses. We as a conference committee were unwilling to march further than the existing law and take in, as it were, a drag-net to bring in other matters of controversy involving large sums of money as well as the expenditures of money for objects which this House has heretofore indicated that it does not propose or is unwilling to allow.

I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], my colleague on the committee, if he desires to be heard further upon this subject. If not, or if there be no other gentleman desiring to submit remarks, I will ask the House to insist upon its disagreement and ask a further conference.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I suppose it is going to be the decree of the House that we shall insist upon the disagreement to the amendments of the Senate. I would rather have heard something this morning about the merits of each of the matters in dispute between the two Houses, than to have heard only aggregate amounts talked about as constituting a difference.

It must be borne in mind that we are creeping along through this year so far as our Navy is concerned. If we are to have a navy, Mr. Speaker, that at last is to become respectable, we ought to begin now and ought in fact to have commenced much earlier. We ought to have entered upon this work years ago and have established a navy that would command the respect of all the maritime nations of the world. We ought to have stood abreast of any of those nations all through the years gone by. But we have not done so. Now, if there be an attempt on the part of the Senate to do something in the direction of making this Navy what it ought to be, although we have failed for the first six months of the current year to do what we should have done, let us be active, vigilant, and prompt in the coming six months.

It is said that we are at difference with the Senate in amounts of money appropriated in matters relating to the cruisers, as well as in other things, and it is argued that we could now go forward and do just as we have been forced to do in the first six months of the current fiscal year. But, Mr. Speaker, we want to remember that for want of time or because of the arbitrary differences in views between the Senate and House of Representatives we simply passed at the last session a resolution continuing the appropriations of the preceding year with some limitations, too, for the last six months.

In that way we succeeded in keeping the Navy alive. We are now reaching the first day of the last half of the present fiscal year, and likely to enter upon it without any sort of provision for the Naval Department of the Government of the United States; and while I am not familiar with the items of this bill, it seems to me it would have been well for the House to understand just the reason why the Senate of the United States stands so firmly in favor of making appropriations for the naval service, which would enlarge it to some extent at least.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill passed for the first six months of this year provided in full for the increase of the Navy, and, as I have already shown, provided, as the present bill provides in full, for the completion of all of the steel cruisers.

Mr. KEIFER. What amount is involved here in dispute between the Senate and the House?

Mr. RANDALL. The difference is principally in reference to the construction of new vessels, not the old ones, the finishing of which, as well as their armament, being provided for just as it was in the first six months of the year.

Mr. KEIFER. That is proposed to be continued now?

Mr. RANDALL. Provision is made for their completion, and appropriations have been made also, as I have said, for their armament.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is done already.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well. It is proposed on the part of the Senate to do something now that is regarded as essential to build up the Navy; and it is upon that point that we would like to have had a full discussion and explanation. Whether the time has arrived that we are to make appropriations for the enlargement of the Navy, if we have completed some vessels, and to build it up into commanding respectability, build it up so that it will be at least in harmony with the other great powers of our Government, so that whether on the Atlantic or the Pacific harbors we may be able to protect ourselves against other nationalities, we ought to begin it now. It has been said that a single vessel owned by the small power of Chili can capture every port or city on the Pacific coast of the United States, and that we will be entirely powerless if we were to have a difficulty with that one single little power. The Pacific coast is open so that we are now practically defenseless, there being no vessel in progress that could compete with such a power. We have nothing in fact to protect our great Pacific seaboard cities. We are exposed on every side; yet here we are dallying and discussing various things instead of proceeding in the direction which has been suggested. But I have only risen to offer my protest against it. I suppose we will have to disagree as before. I admire the gentleman's persistency in standing up for the judgment of the House and his own judgment; but I would rather have met this question upon its broad merits.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not discuss the merits for two reasons: First, because the merits had been discussed at length at the last session, and also because I did not think it would be wise to discuss them at this time. But as the gentleman from Ohio has opened the subject, I want to say in answer, for I have nothing to conceal, that these cruisers are but experiments at most, and that none of them are yet afloat. The dispatch boat has been afloat but is put up for repair already. She broke her steel shaft, and that of itself should warrant us to go slowly in these particulars.

So far as the present cruisers are concerned I want emphatically to say, what I interrupted the gentleman from Ohio to say, that we have already given every dollar in the bill for the last six months to finish, arm, and put them afloat; so that they are not at all in controversy. So far as the gentleman seeks to pay a compliment to my persistency I want to say that in this case, as I do in every case, I recognized that I was the mere voice of a majority of this House, and I have endeavored to keep myself in that exact relation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Leaving out these new vessels which the Senate proposes to build, leaving out the main question of dispute discussed so much in the last session, I wish to ask the gentleman what is in substance the difference between the Senate and the House?

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate enters on legislation in reference to many objects. The aggregate amount is, I think, about $800,000.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is it that the Senate desires to spend money for items to which the gentleman thinks the House does not agree? Is that the difference?

Mr. RANDALL. I object as one of the conferees to giving an appropriation for any objects not itemized by the action of the Navy Department in the expenditure of money during the first six months of the fiscal year. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], my colleague on the committee of conference.

Mr. LONG. While I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] as to the desirability of an increase of the Navy, I think that is scarcely the question which troubles the conferees on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House. If there be no objection I will read from the remarks of the chairman of the conference committee of the Senate as I find them in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made on the floor the Chair will not interpose an objection.

Mr. LONG. I find these remarks in the RECORD:

> Moreover, we said, "as there are large differences in amounts, as the bill which was matured last session contains the provision for the new cruisers and all the extra expenditure involved in that enterprise, the Senate is willing here to say that it recognizes the fact that we do not agree to give up these cruisers, but if the House insists that it will not put them on the appropriation bill, the Senate conferees feel that they can not drive the House on this subject, so that there would be, if we could consider and confer upon all the items, probably no difficulty."

I infer, sir, from that that the question of the new cruisers and of the increase of the Navy is not a question about which there is likely to be any difficulty.

That brings us then to ask what is the question really between the two Houses? When the Committee on Appropriations came together, after proper consultation with the head of the Department of the Navy, and acting in consonance with what was understood to be the opinion of that Department, the committee reported a bill extending the temporary provision, which had been made for the current six months, for the rest of the year. It is recognized that this is not wise and good legislation, nor altogether a good precedent. The reasons for our action in that respect were practical reasons. In the first place, the fiscal year is a unit from July to July. It is desirable that the books of the Navy Department should be kept in accordance with that unit. It was thought desirable on the part of the committee, concurring I understand with the head of the Department, not to have one system of appropriations for one half of the year and another system for the other half of the year. We shall not spend all the money appropriated for the present six months. Certain balances will go over unexpended. Undoubtedly the officers of the Executive Department of the Navy in making expenditures under the present temporary bill have acted with due reference to the six months, but somewhat also with reference to the whole year. It might introduce confusion in the book-keeping and some confusion in the proper carrying out of the executive work of the Department if we should vary the system for the next six months from what it has been for the current six months.

There is also the practical difficulty of determining in the short time left us what is desirable for the next six months. Therefore the House Committee on Appropriations presented, and the House passed, a bill extending the provision for the present six months to the next six months. That went to the Senate and the Senate amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the provisions of the bill which was in dispute and in conference between the two Houses at the last session and on which the two Houses could not agree. Your conference committee were appointed; they met in conference. The House conferees presented the reasons for their action and for insisting on the extension of the temporary bill which they have presented.

The first criticism made by the Senate conferees was that it is a bad principle to legislate in a lump. Our answer to that is that we are not appropriating a lump sum. We propose to continue for the next six months the same appropriation under which we are acting for the present six months. That would make for the year a bill exactly like the bill of 1883, for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1884. That bill is clearly itemized and specific. The Department in expending the money will be bound strictly by its specifications and items. There will be nothing, therefore, in a lump sum, but everything is itemized and specified.

The second objection was that every appropriation bill when made ought to be made to accord with the circumstances existing at the time it is made. The Senate conferees say that the bill passed in 1883 was made with reference to the circumstances of the year about to follow upon the date of its enactment.

They then say that the bill under disagreement between the two Houses at the last session was framed with reference to the circumstances of this year, and that it is not good policy for us to pass now a bill which was adapted to circumstances as they formerly existed, and not to present circumstances. Even on that ground we answer that the difference is merely one of degree and time. If we pass now the bill of last session, still we are adopting a bill which was prepared with reference not to present circumstances, but to such as existed six months ago. But even on the doctrine of adapting our legislation to existing circumstances, is not the bill extending for the next six months the temporary provision made for the last six months the measure best adapted to the present and immediate circumstances of the Navy? The Navy Department has been acting under that bill, has arranged all its expenditures with reference to the provisions of that bill, has kept its books upon the basis of the items embraced in that bill; and hence, in repassing that bill we adapt ourselves more closely to the present circumstances and exigencies of the Navy than by adopting any other.

The third objection on the part of the Senate was an objection of principle and of precedent. It was urged that it is the duty of every legislative body not to adopt a former bill, even if it be itemized and even if the necessities of the present case be somewhat assimilated to those before existing; and that a legislative body should make up a new bill carefully and according to the wants and necessities of the present time. I agree that this principle is of weight; but it weighs against both the Senate and the House propositions. Each of them is obnoxious to objection in that respect, one being the Senate bill of six months ago and the other the House bill of a year and a half ago. But here the difficulty is a practical one: it is that in the five or six hours remaining before the anticipated recess we have not time to take up these questions from the beginning and prepare a new specific bill.

A MEMBER. Why cannot this question go over till after the recess?

Mr. LONG. If it goes over till after the recess, then on the 1st of January there is no appropriation at all for the expenses of the Navy; and, besides, if it goes over till after the recess it is impossible to state how much time might be taken in preparing a new bill.

Only one other suggestion. All these great questions connected with the Navy must of necessity be considered thoroughly, carefully, and fully at this session—not only questions as to the ordinary running expenses of the Department, but as to new cruisers and an increase of the Navy. How can there be any more fitting opportunity for the consideration of these questions than will be presented upon the regular naval appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1886?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] to answer a single question.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe I still hold the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands, but the gentleman from Illinois desires to put a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Merely a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to answer the question which I put to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]—what are the specific points of difference between the two bills, leaving out this question of the new cruisers, which I admit must be left out?

Mr. RANDALL. I enumerated them in my remarks.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The gentleman said they amounted to so much, but without giving the different points.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will permit me to say that I enumerated them by items, and then I ventured the opinion that they aggregated in money about $800,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit some brief remarks, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Although this is a privileged subject, I feel bound to regard the wish of the gentleman from Texas as to the time which it may consume.

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer to leave that matter under the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire only five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the adoption of the temporary bill as proposed by the House committee. At the last session there was presented to this House by the Appropriations Committee a bill making full and complete appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. After full consideration by the House that bill was sent to the Senate, and after consideration and amendment in that body it was returned here. There is no special difficulty involved in taking up that bill, which was designed specifically for the current fiscal year, and disposing of that measure instead of attempting to pass a temporary bill based upon the appropriations for the fiscal year 1883-'84, which are not now applicable.

There is no such urgency as demands that this House should take the appropriations made for a former year and adopt them by a general provision, instead of taking a measure which has been considered and matured and which had special reference to the wants and necessities of the Navy for the present year. The only effect of doing so is that some very important legislation embraced in that bill is cut out by this slipshod attempt to dodge a stern duty devolving upon this House to meet promptly and fairly the demands of the service for each fiscal year. I think we ought to take up that regular legitimate bill to which I have referred, instead of attempting to substitute this carrying-over bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. If I understand this present motion, Mr. Speaker, it has no reference whatever to future construction of a navy. I think my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] mistakes it. We have already provided, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has stated, for four cruisers. The cruisers of the future, the seven cruisers every year for ten years, seventy cruisers, proposed by the Secretary of the Navy, are not thought of in this discussion. If anything is to be done hereafter on that subject it has to be done on the next Navy appropriation bill, the bill for the next fiscal year, or else by some action of this Congress produced here irrespective of the Appropriations Committee.

I believe the $800,000 which are to be appropriated in this bill by the action of the Senate, and as to which our people do not agree that amount may well be considered in conference. If that amount concerns the building of guns, it is about time to begin building them. It takes time—about three years—to create this gunnery board, as my friend well knows. It takes time in advance to make these iron ships, ironclad or otherwise—armored vessels, torpedoes, and other similar vessels, including ironclads. So we must in some way or the other, if not now, after the holidays, on the bill for the next fiscal year, determine what we shall do; or, if not then, in the next Congress determine what we shall do for the protection of our coasts and our honor at home and everywhere.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House further insist on the amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I gathered from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], assented to in part if not entirely by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], that this is largely a question of form or propriety or of opinion as to what shape should be given to the proposed legislation in conference between the House and Senate. Now, sir, if that be true, then I care nothing about it.

However, on examining the Senate bill, or rather the Senate amendments, I find they do propose or do provide for the construction of new cruisers, for the construction of two heavily armed gunboats, for the construction of one steam-ram as recommended by the naval advisory board, and so on.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], and in opposing these Senate amendments, stated that the cruisers which are now about to be completed are merely experimental, and that at this time we could not tell whether they will be a success or otherwise. That may be true if there be no other method of determining their success except by actually floating them in the sea and putting them into actual service. But, sir, it is also true that board after board has recommended them, and that we have had boards skilled in naval architecture, composed of professional gentlemen, who have been educated at the expense of the Government, who have reported in favor of the feasibility of these ships, and I had supposed we could rely in some degree at least on such advice after earnest inquiry.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] since 1874, Mr. Speaker, the Democratic party being in power in this House with the exception of two years, has, I think, invariably taken the position he would not countenance the construction of any ship whatever because it would be merely experimental.

Mr. RANDALL. I never made any such statement.

Mr. CANNON. Ah!

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Since the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been Speaker part of the time, and part of the time at the head of the Appropriations Committee, the truth is, by his disapproval or that of his party, no ship has been constructed or entered upon.

Mr. RANDALL. If there has been no ship constructed properly it rests with the administration of the Navy Department, which has, during all the time alluded to, been under the control and in the charge of a representative of the gentleman's own political party. It has not been in any respect controlled or administered by a member of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman reminds me, in his position now as in his position heretofore, of the words of the old song:

> Mother, may I go out to swim?
> Yes, my darling daughter;
> Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
> But don't go near the water.

[Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. But I want a vessel that can swim. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Vessels constructed that can swim—but, Mr. Speaker, no vessels can swim until they are constructed. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And now the gentleman says that the fault lies in the administration of the Navy Department, as he has been saying for years and years, certainly to my personal knowledge for the last ten years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the administration is about to change. We, on this side of the House, speaking for myself as one of this side, are so anxious for a navy that notwithstanding the Democracy are to come in on the 4th of March, and the administration of the Department will change, stand ready to make these appropriations of money to be expended under that administration.

One word in conclusion. I want to say to the gentleman that grave questions touching our foreign policy are pressing upon us day by day and week by week; and throughout the length and breadth of the country a strong argument in the settlement of these questions and in the proposed ratification, of important treaties is an argument, and perhaps the strongest one, against their ratification, that the United States is not prepared to follow any policy that would redound to its credit and well-being in certain directions; that it stands powerless before the world to enter upon a policy, because by the policy outlined by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who supported the Democratic idea for the last ten years, we are crippled and without power of defense so far as our Navy is concerned.

Mr. RANDALL. Only a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat. All the appropriations for the maintenance of the Navy for years past have been under the control of the party to which the gentleman belongs, and if that money has produced no ships this side of the House, nor any one in harmony with it politically, is in any degree responsible therefor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Allow me a question?

Mr. RANDALL. And I want to say that the course of wisdom would indicate that these vessels now being built should be first allowed to float so that we may see whether they come up to the measure of our expectations or not. If they do not, we certainly do not want to construct more of that kind. It is not wise, therefore, until they are completed that we should in advance make appropriations for their duplication nor should we permit in any way contracts to be made for such duplication in view of the suggestion that seems to be founded upon a wise policy on the part of the Congress.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated a moment ago that sufficient money had been appropriated in the last ten years, and that it was not his fault or his party's fault that it had not been expended in building ships. In reply to that suggestion I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that it was out of the power of the head of the Navy Department to construct a ship until he was authorized to do so by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. There have been appropriated since the close of the war, for naval purposes, some $400,000,000 and over——

Mr. ELLIS. And over one hundred and fifty million for construction and repairs.

Mr. RANDALL. And I would like to be cautious in saying how much has been used for construction and repairs, but I will venture to say not less than one hundred and fifty millions.

Mr. CANNON. For repairs, not construction. Nor has the head of the Department had power to construct a single ship out of all the appropriations made.

Mr. RANDALL. As I have said, I mention that amount with great caution.

Mr. ELLIS. That is correct. The figures are about $154,000,000 for construction and repair since the close of the war.

Mr. KEIFER. What did we construct?

Mr. ELLIS. That sum was sufficient to have completed the construction of thirty vessels such as the Lepanto, the most powerful and the most formidable naval vessel afloat in the world to-day, and yet the Senate of the United States insist upon going on with the construction of the cruisers already under the fire of criticism of all naval authorities and architects in the world—vessels which we believe to be too slow to catch a merchantman, too slow to run away from an armed vessel, while at the same time they are utterly unable to fight the battles of the country. Now, until there is some verification by absolute results of the efficiency of these vessels, it is worse than futile to attempt to embark upon the plan of duplicating them or of increasing their number. No gentleman on that side of the House, no man in this country will go further than I would go in appropriating the public moneys to build up a navy that the country ought to have, and of which it may be justly proud. But looking to the amendments of the Senate, I see that the items upon which we disagree are in the line of experiment alone, and until experiments already made are verified by practical results, in my judgment, sir, we had better call a halt.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, we will soon be called upon to frame the naval appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, and in the consideration of that bill, by having the advice of the highest authorities in the country, I will go with the gentleman as far as the farthest in providing the country with a navy that shall make it respected in time of peace and invincible in time of war. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on the motion that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask a further conference.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House do further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LONG.

SLATER NATIONAL BANK OF NORTH PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] desires the action of the House on a matter that will take but a moment and which is indispensable to be acted on before the recess. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration a Senate bill which proposes simply to change the name of a bank.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I., was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I., be changed to the Slater National Bank of Pawtucket, R. I., whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, confirmed by a vote or the written consent of stockholders holding two-thirds of the stock of the bank, and cause a copy of such action, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance shall be made within six months after the passage of this act.

and that all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 2. That all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Slater National Bank of North Providence shall inure to the Slater National Bank of Pawtucket, R. I., whenever such change of name is effected.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. CHACE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday the 24th instant. In that connection I want to make a statement. The Constitution prohibits an adjournment without the concurrence of the Senate for a period longer than three days. There is to-day a bare quorum of the House present. A careful count a short while ago developed that there was not a quorum of members then in their seats; there may have been a quorum including other gentlemen not at that time in the Hall. Therefore we have to make this motion at once. And I want to say that I think we should come to the understanding—which, I am authorized to state, will occasion no inconvenience to the Speaker, as he intends to remain here during the recess, and it is necessary to adopt this course in order to give effect to the judgment of the House as to the holiday adjournment—that when the 24th comes it shall be unanimously understood that the House shall be called to order and that no business whatever, even by unanimous consent, shall be in order; that there shall be in order on the 24th only an adjournment to the 27th, and on that day only an adjournment to the 31st, and on that day only an adjournment to the 5th day of January, 1885.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would like to ask what would be the effect of this in case the Senate should agree to the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. That of course would vacate what is now proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The action of the Senate and the House together would vacate the order made by either House separately.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the adoption of the resolution first, and afterward the unanimous agreement by the House to the effect I have stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this House should vote that when it adjourns to-day it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday next, is not that practically a vacation of the vote of the House agreeing to the concurrent resolution to adjourn to the 5th of January?

The SPEAKER. The House alone could not vacate an order made by the Senate and House together.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Senate has not yet made that order. We have sent that concurrent resolution to the Senate. Suppose the Senate before it adjourns to-day agrees to that resolution, where are we?

Mr. RANDALL. Why, in that case, the resolution I now offer will be, of course, vacated. The adoption of the concurrent resolution will be the final action of the two Houses providing for an adjournment beyond three days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House if it desires to vacate its action on the concurrent resolution must recall it by a direct vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to recall the concurrent resolution. If the Senate concurs in the resolution to adjourn to the 5th of January, then that vacates this resolution. But if the Senate sees fit to attempt to hold us here, we can do nothing because we have not a quorum, and it is well known the subject under consideration will not be permitted to be proceeded with without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when the House adjourns to-day it shall adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. REED. While not opposing the motion, I desire to express my doubt whether the House under the Constitution can make an arrangement of this character which will be binding.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the gentleman from Maine, I will say that I am not seeking to evade the Constitution at all; on the contrary, I am seeking to meet its requirements.

Mr. REED. I merely wish to express my personal doubt in the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Maine, with his judicial knowledge, can suggest any improved method which will provide for the comfort of members in a better way than this I have no tenacity of purpose as to my own proposition.

Mr. REED. I stated distinctly that I proposed to make no opposition. I simply wished to state I had my doubts about it as a matter of personal judgment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question before the House is not debatable under the rules. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made a statement with the view of having an understanding, but not to debate the question.

A MEMBER. What is the motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has moved that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next, and in connection with that motion he made a statement as to what he desired to be the understanding on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I did this at the solicitation of a great number of members, and not upon my own motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether the adoption by the House of the course now proposed will not be practically an evasion of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. That is a matter for the House to determine in voting upon the proposition.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to call attention to two paragraphs of the Constitution of the United States; and I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But, Mr. Speaker, the question has been debated. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky, by unanimous consent, will be allowed to put to me the question he desires.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire in the first place to ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this provision of the Constitution, on page 5 of the Manual:

Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the proceeding now proposed is not practically an effort to nullify the Constitution, and whether——

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman had listened to the motion I made he would have understood it to be that when this House shall adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, the 24th instant.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have not yet read the other clause of the Constitution to which I referred. I read from page 4 of the Manual:

A majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Now, the Senate refuses to agree to the resolution for a holiday adjournment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to this House the adoption of a resolution to the effect that the great body of members go home, while a few shall be allowed to meet here on the 24th instant, but to do no business even by unanimous consent, but to adjourn again for three days, and then again for three days more; and so on until the 5th of January, thus defeating the will of the Senate in this matter and the express provisions of the Constitution to which I have called attention.

A gentleman on the Democratic side says, "Knock the bottom out of the Constitution." That is just what gentlemen on that side purpose to accomplish, if they adopt the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I have proposed what in my judgment is a common-sense method of meeting the present difficulty. If there be any better mode of accomplishing the wish of the great body of the House, without respect to sides, so that members who have determined to leave for their homes may do so, I am ready to assent to it. But surely this proposition is in order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the motion upon which we are to vote goes any further than to adjourn until Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has already stated, the motion is simply that when the House shall adjourn it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is there anything before the House except the mere proposition for a recess till Wednesday next?

The SPEAKER. Nothing whatever. No other question is presented to be voted upon.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should adjourn until next Wednesday, could less than a quorum at that time take a recess until Friday night for the transaction of pension business in pursuance of the standing order of the House?

The SPEAKER. Less than a quorum can transact no business except to adjourn, or to take measures for the purpose of compelling the attendance of absent members.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to agree to any understanding which may accomplish the purpose of the great body of the House, and at the same time avoid all possibility of variance with either the spirit or the letter of the Constitution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, there were—ayes 140, noes 16.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of no quorum, let us have tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will make that point if you do not give us the yeas and nays. I would like to see the other side of the House on record.

Mr. RANDALL. The country has put us on record.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, they were not ordered, there being only one vote in favor thereof.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. RANDALL and Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 156, noes 9.

So the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to reconsider and lay upon the table?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not, as it may be important in a certain contingency to reconsider the vote.

HENRY A. PAUS.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7796) for the relief of Henry A. Paus; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to close debate on the pending amendment and on the section under consideration, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, but the gentleman from Texas has demanded the previous question on it.

Mr. REED. When did the gentleman demand the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demanded the previous question when he was on the floor and made the motion to close debate.

Mr. REED. I wish to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. REED. On page 402 of the RECORD will be found the following:

Mr. REAGAN. I move to limit debate on the pending section and amendment to five minutes.
The SPEAKER pro tempore—

That pro tempore is Latin and refers to gentlemen who are occasionally in the chair. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is not debatable.
Mr. REED. Under what rule is it not debatable?
The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). Motions to limit debate are not debatable.

Mr. REED. Now I do not state that for the purpose of putting the permanent occupant of the chair in the wrong [laughter], but merely to express the hope that the temporary chairmen hereafter may be so instructed on these subjects that they may temporarily at least possess the wisdom and courtesy and good sense which distinguish the permanent occupant of the chair. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order in that statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. With the permission of the Chair and the House I would like to make a statement in regard to that matter. I was occupying the chair yesterday when the gentleman from Texas made the motion to close debate on the pending section and amendment. The gentleman from Maine was proceeding to debate that proposition, or an effort was being made to secure a compromise in the matter, and the Chair indulged the debate for a moment; but seeing the House was about to drift off into a general debate, he stated that he must put an end to it, as the motion to close debate was not debatable. And, sir, I made that statement while occupying the chair temporarily with a full understanding of its force and its parliamentary effect. I still entertain the belief that I decided correctly. I have looked into the Journals of the House as well as into the Digest, and there is not an opinion by any previous occupant of the chair contrary to that decision. My decision, sir, was bottomed on common sense, and I stand upon it, although it may not commend me in any very large degree to the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, sir, the motion that debate be closed is directed to the House, and intended to close debate and not to continue debate. It is so evident as scarcely to need argument. It is analogous in this proceeding to a motion in the House for the previous question, and every gentleman will agree when the previous question is moved in the House you can not debate the propriety of closing debate on that demand for the previous question. The rules are meant to express some idea, and when the motion is made to close debate, whether by the previous question in the House or the motion to close debate in this proceeding, it is intended to bring the House to a decision on that question at once, and not to continue the debate.

We have endeavored for the first time to reach some conclusion as to what rule shall govern the proceedings of the House when the House is considering a bill as in the Committee of the Whole. When the House was considering a bill as in the Committee of the Whole it took with it from the committee the rule which provided for limiting debate. If we have any portion of that rule in operation in the House, we, of course, have the whole of it. It was adopted for the purpose of closing debate in committee that that rule was adopted, and when the House is acting as in Committee of the Whole it has the same rule. It was for that reason I decided in the way in which I did. I believed it then to be parliamentary, and I believe it to be so now. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, on page 196——

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of order before the House. The gentleman from Maine rose and stated he rose to a question of order, but there is no question of order pending, so far as the Chair sees.

Mr. REED. I thought the indulgence of the House would permit me——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman feels that way, all right.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Texas to withdraw his demand for the previous question and allow me to go on for two or three minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. So far as I am concerned I would be glad to yield to gentlemen, but if I yield to one I must yield to thirty or forty others who are just as anxious to be heard on this proposition, which has already been discussed so fully in general debate.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. In general debate, yes; but when we come down to the point of voting on important provisions of the bill itself, I do not think the gentleman ought to cut off debate when we come down to the consideration of important provisions in the bill and when they are to be voted upon. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the pending question is on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 39.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No quorum has voted.

Mr. REAGAN. If three minutes would satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I am willing to make that compromise.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I mean three or four minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman can take five minutes, if that will do.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] also desires to be heard.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no doubt there are forty members here who would like to be heard, but I do not propose to go off into any further general debate on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be permitted to occupy the floor for five minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], to strike out the long and short haul section of this bill. But before I go into that I desire to make this remark, and to have the House understand it, that of all the men who appeared before the Committee on Commerce against the substitute bill—men who have studied the railroad question for years—there was not a single, solitary man who testified that any railroad in the country made larger charge for a short haul for the purpose of making a lower charge for a long haul.

I will state here that if the gentleman from Texas had only permitted my resolution to pass through the House, when I asked of the House to pass a resolution to authorize the printing of the arguments and testimony before the Committee on Commerce for the information of the House, information which every member ought to have upon his desk at this time, there would have been much more satisfaction in the consideration of this matter. I regret, sir, that that information has not come into this House from the document-room, as ordinarily every document of great importance does come; I regret that it has not been laid upon the desk of every member before the House was called to act upon this bill. For some reason I have not been enabled, and I am informed that others have not been able, to receive copies sufficient of that argument and testimony, which they should have had for the last two weeks, and we have not now that information. There has been a desire to keep the House in ignorance of these propositions, in ignorance of these arguments, in ignorance of the reasons stated by men who know something about the workings of railroads, so that the House could not have an opportunity of acting properly and intelligently upon each section of this bill.

I want to state again that no one man heard by that committee in this or in any other Congress when the interstate-commerce bill was before it, and in the care of the Commerce Committee, has pretended that the short hauls were used for purposes of bringing revenue to the railroad companies as against the long hauls.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the gentleman means no attorney or managers of the road made any such acknowledgment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not say attorneys. I say that no railroad man appeared before that committee and made such a statement. Not one of them appeared before the committee, and no person competent to speak upon the subject made any such statement, notwithstanding the fact of the billions of money invested in railroad corporations in this country.

Mr. Speaker, one other word and then I will take my seat. I stated in my remarks made in this House a few days ago that there was no intelligent public sentiment in this country to-day, as expressed through the channels of the petition-box of this House, in favor of this bill, and that there was during this Congress on this question no public agitation favoring such a bill as that introduced in the substitute of the gentleman from Texas. I have taken pains, sir, to look through the RECORD, and I find that there are some five or six individual petitions on the files of the House. I find the action of one Legislature of one of the States, the Legislature of Iowa, presented here in printed form by five members of that State, which makes five representing the same resolutions of the same Legislatures and also one other Legislature. That is all.

I want to get this fact before the House, because I have taken the trouble to hunt it up in response to the suggestion that these petitions were crowding the petition-box, to show how little foundation there is for the statement. There is nothing upon the records of this Congress to show the desire of the people for the passage of any such law on the subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to ask if he regards the Legislature of Pennsylvania as an intelligent body, and the Legislature of New York as composed of intelligent men?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Since the Legislature of Pennsylvania sent that resolution to this House it has passed a law upon the subject and carried out the provisions of the constitution of the State with reference to its railroads and canals. That act passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania I quoted in my remarks upon this bill in the general debate.

Mr. REAGAN. And let me ask does the gentleman regard the President of the United States as an intelligent source for such information? I refer him also to the Republican national convention.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I regard the President of the United States as a very intelligent gentleman, and one who has known how to fill the Presidential office, but I do not say that I indorse everything that he has communicated to this House in his message.

Mr. REAGAN. What about the resolution of the Republican national convention?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The resolutions of that convention meant that we should pass intelligent legislation; that we should pass practical legislation; that we should not be brought into such a position as the gentleman from Texas would bring us in by the passage of his substitute bill. That convention never meant to recommend the adoption of such a law as that, and I hope the House will strike out that section.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to close the debate upon the pending section and amendment.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to strike out a portion of the fourth paragraph, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of section 4 the following words:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and."

So that the section will read:

"SEC. 4. The road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 57, nays 117, not voting 149; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I am paired with Mr. MURPHY, of Iowa. If he were present, I should vote "ay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. BRAINERD. I voted inadvertently. Being paired I withdraw my vote. I should have voted, if not paired, in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, by unanimous consent the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. POTTER with Mr. EVANS.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. HOOPER.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.
Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. CHACE.
Mr. ARNOT with Mr. BELFORD.
Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH.
Mr. KING with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. BLAND with Mr. VALENTINE.
Mr. FIEDLER with Mr. STEELE.
Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. JOHN S. WISE.
Mr. MULLER with Mr. DUNHAM.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. BAYNE.
Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BOWEN.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, with Mr. YORK.
Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. FINERTY.
Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. MCCORMICK.
Mr. VANCE with Mr. WHITING.
Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. RUSSELL.
Mr. AIKEN with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.
Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, with Mr. KELLEY.
Mr. MONEY with Mr. ATKINSON.
Mr. MURPHY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.
Mr. WELLER with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.
Mr. MURRAY with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.
Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. KELLOGG.
Mr. COSGROVE with Mr. PETTIBONE.
Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. HOLTON.
Mr. STORM with Mr. BRUMM.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. HARMER.
Mr. KLEINER with Mr. LIBBEY.
Mr. CARLETON with Mr. ROWELL.
Mr. HOUSEMAN with Mr. BREITUNG.

The following members were announced as paired on the interstate-commerce bill:

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. HART.

Mr. HILL with Mr. CHALMERS.

Mr. RANKIN with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, with Mr. HATCH, of Michigan.

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, and on all political questions.

The following pairs were also announced:

Mr. DOCKERY with Mr. MCCOID, until December 21.

Mr. MILLARD with Mr. MULDROW, until January 5.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. RICE, until January 5.

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. REED, until January 5.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. HISCOCK, until January 5.

Mr. OATES with Mr. RANNEY, until January 5.

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. WADSWORTH, until January 5.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, with Mr. CANNON, until January 5.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, until January 5.

Mr. POST with Mr. BRAINERD, until January 5.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. GEORGE, for this day.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. KETCHAM, for Saturday, December 20.

Mr. GEDDES, if present, would vote for the Reagan bill, and Mr. KETCHAM against it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I voted not knowing I was paired with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER]. I withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, to extend in the RECORD his remarks in connection with the amendment just voted upon.

Mr. PETERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "railroad," in line 6, section 4, the following:
"The longer distance to be limited to the nearest competing point at which two or more railroads compete for business."

Mr. PETERS. I would like to have the section read as it will be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; the longer distance to be limited to the nearest competing point at which two or more railroads compete for business.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 16, noes 68.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. There is no quorum voting. I think we should not legislate on this subject without a quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PETERS and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The House proceeded to divide, but before the result was announced,

Mr. REAGAN said: Mr. Speaker, if it be in order pending this vote, I will call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 55 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 13, nays 142, not voting 168; as follows:

The SPEAKER. It appears that no quorum has voted.

Mr. REAGAN. I move a call of the House.

Mr. WAIT. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. WAIT was not agreed to, there being—ayes 63, noes 67.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. REAGAN for a call of the House, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 61, noes 57.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service; agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. GLASCOCK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern division of the district of East Tennessee, and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

A call of the House having been ordered, the Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following-named members failed to answer:

Adams, J. J.	Campbell, Felix	Fiedler,	Hurd,
Aiken,	Campbell, J. E.	Findlay,	Jeffords,
Arnot,	Carleton,	Finerty,	Jones, J. K.
Atkinson,	Cassidy,	Garrison,	Jones, J. T.
Bagley,	Chalmers,	Geddes,	Kelley,
Ballentine,	Clay,	Graves,	Kellogg,
Barbour,	Cosgrove,	Hardy,	Ketcham,
Bayne,	Cox, S. S.	Harmer,	King,
Belford,	Crisp,	Hatch, H. H.	Kleiner,
Belmont,	Dargan,	Hatch, W. H.	Lawrence,
Bingham,	Davis, G. R.	Hemphill,	Libbey,
Bisbee,	Davis, L. H.	Herbert,	Lore,
Bland,	Dibble,	Hewitt, A. S.	McCoid,
Bowen,	Dockery,	Hewitt, G. W.	Maybury,
Boyle,	Dorsheimer,	Hiscock,	Millard,
Brainerd,	Dunham,	Hoblitzell,	Money,
Breitung,	Eldredge,	Holton,	Morgan,
Brewer, J. H.	Elliott,	Hooper,	Morrison,
Brumm,	Ellwood,	Horr,	Morse,
Burleigh,	English,	Houk,	Muldrow,
Caldwell,	Ermentrout,	Houseman,	Muller,

Murphy,	Potter,	Skinner, T. G.	Valentine,
Murray,	Rankin,	Slocum,	Van Alstyne,
Mutchler,	Ranney,	Smith, A. H.	Vance,
Nicholls,	Rice,	Steele,	Wadsworth,

Patton,	Russell,	Talbott,	Wise, J. S.
Payne,	Shaw,	Taylor, E. B.	Young.
Pettibone,	Shelley,	Turner, H. G.

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be closed.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. REAGAN. How many members voted on the call of the roll?

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-five members have responded to the call of the roll.

Mr. HAMMOND'S motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll has once been called, but a quorum failed to vote.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Let us have the yeas and nays on that motion to lay on the table.

Mr. KEIFER. Is this proposition to lay the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KEIFER. That is entirely useless any way—it amounts to nothing, for the right to order the yeas and nays is, under the Constitution, when one-fifth of those present shall request it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Texas ought to have the yeas and nays when he asks for them.

The SPEAKER. The purpose of the gentleman from Texas is to prevent a reconsideration of the vote and to insure the taking of the vote on the amendment by the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEIFER. He can have the yeas and nays whenever one-fifth of the House shall request it.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Is it in order to withdraw my amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is. The amendment having been voted on and a quorum having failed to appear, the roll must again be called.

Mr. PETERS. Because I have no right to explain my amendment, debate having been cut off on this section, and because the vote just taken has disclosed opposition to it, I will now withdraw it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman the right to do that?

The SPEAKER. Yes; as the previous question was not ordered on the amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the opportunity to say a word to the gentleman from Kansas. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I hope the gentleman from Kansas will not withdraw his amendment, so that the gentleman from Texas may be allowed to have the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. RYAN. The amendment is withdrawn, as I understand, by the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. It has been withdrawn, and the gentleman from Kansas has the right under the rules to withdraw it. There is now nothing before the House, the amendment having been withdrawn, and the Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn. The House is not in condition to vote.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the country understands, is filibustering.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I demand a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 71.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question. There are so many absentees.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We had better postpone until the House is full and when we can have a deliberate vote. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LACEY. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "receive," in line 3 of section 4, to and including the word "railroad," at end of line 6, and insert:

"As compensation for carrying, receiving, storing, handling, or forwarding said property to any station on his or their road, a greater sum than is charged or received for a similar amount and kind of property from the same original point of departure to a station at a greater distance on the same road in the same direction, nor shall a less sum be charged or received for a similar amount and kind of property from any station on said road to another station on said road than is charged from any other station situated between the aforesaid points of shipment and delivery.

Mr. LACEY. I ask that the Clerk read the amendment as it will read if adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive as compensation for carrying, receiving, storing, handling, or forwarding said property to any station on his or their road a greater sum than is charged or received for a similar amount and kind of property from the same original point of departure to a station at a greater distance on the same road in the same direction, nor shall a less sum be charged or received for a similar amount and kind of property from any station on said road to another station on said road than is charged from any other station situated between the aforesaid points of shipment and delivery; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment which I think the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will accept, as it only makes certain what probably was intended to be provided for in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "distance," in line 6, insert "which include the shorter;" so it will read: "for a shorter than for a longer distance which include the shorter on any one railroad," &c.

Mr. REAGAN. It is what I understand the bill to be now, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. BUDD. I wish to offer an amendment to the same effect, but in a direction which will be more effective.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BUDD. I wish to ask the attention of the gentleman from Texas to my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer it as a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUDD. I do.

The Clerk read Mr. BUDD'S amendment, as follows:

Amend by adding in line 6, after the word "distance," the following words: "in all cases in which the shorter distance shall be over the same roadway and in the same direction."

Mr. REAGAN. I can not consent to accept the amendment. It is only multiplying trouble. The bill means that now.

Mr. BUDD'S amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 19.

Mr. O'HARA. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. O'HARA, and Mr. WARNER of Ohio.

Mr. O'HARA, by unanimous consent, withdrew his point of no quorum.

So the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. It is manifest, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to proceed with business this afternoon, and I shall not object to yielding the floor for the introduction and reference of bills for the present, and I understand the Committee on Appropriations will occupy the time of the House in reporting an appropriation bill. If I do not compromise the condition of the interstate-commerce bill, I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. If the House now passes from the consideration of this bill to other business it will retain its place as unfinished business.

Mr. REAGAN. With that understanding I will consent to it being laid aside for the present.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to know, if there is any rule requiring small matters to be considered by a quorum, whether large matters can be considered by less than a quorum. I shall insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky insists on the consideration of the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The bill which is before the House. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that it does not appear a quorum is present.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the regular order, which is the further consideration of the interstate-commerce bill, and which demand cuts off all requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Committee on Appropriations, as I understand, desire to present some important measure of legislation, I shall not move, as I otherwise, would be inclined to do, that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out the fourth section.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 61.

Mr. WOODWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield to me to introduce a bill?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATION FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent at this time to introduce a bill for immediate action.

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RANDALL. It is, I may say, a privileged bill, but it is not reported from the Committee on Appropriations by authority of the committee, although I have conferred with several members of the committee, and with all the members of the conference committee on the part of the House on the naval appropriation bill, and I introduce the bill with their consent. To that extent it is a bill from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of providing for the expenses of the naval service for the month ending January 31, 1885, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum of money, no greater in amount than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1884 as thirty-one days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year, and for the like purposes and containing the provisions relating thereto as were made by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883 (except as hereinafter declared), subject to all the limitations and conditions in respect to the disbursement of the appropriations hereby made that were imposed by said act and the other laws of the United States upon or in respect to the appropriation made by said act: Provided, That nothing is appropriated by this act for the purposes set forth in said act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1884, under the heading "Increase of the Navy," and preceding the heading "Naval Academy," "For special ocean surveys and the publication thereof," or "For the purchase and manufacture, after full investigation and test, in the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of torpedoes adapted to naval warfare, or of the right to manufacture the same, and for the fixtures and machinery necessary for operating the same;" nor is there reappropriated any balance of the appropriation made for commencing the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns, with carriages and ammunition, that remained unexpended during the fiscal year 1883; but in lieu of such reappropriation there is hereby appropriated for such manufacture, during the thirty-one days herein provided for, the sum of $2,152.80; and that the clause under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks," commencing "For general maintenance of yards and docks," is amended so as to appropriate for the thirty-one days herein provided for the sum of $18,840.

That all appropriations made by the act of July 7, 1884, making temporary provision for the naval service for the six months ending December 31, 1884, or any balances thereof that may be unexpended at that date, except any balance for the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns as aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, reappropriated, continued, and made available for the remainder of the fiscal year ending January 31, 1885.

That the whole amount appropriated by this act for the support of the naval service for the thirty-one days herein provided for shall not exceed, exclusive of the amounts herein reappropriated and the amount payable from the income from the naval pension fund for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,160,000.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a provision for thirty-one days, and is identical in all respects with the bill which was passed at the last session of Congress for this purpose, with the exception, of course, that it provides for only one month instead of six. It is introduced here by me, I will state again, with the concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations, as far as I have been able to confer with the members, and also with the knowledge and approval of the conferees on this bill, so that out of abundant caution the Navy Department may not be deprived of funds from the 1st to the 5th of January, as it might be if no such provision were made. Although it is proper I should say I am advised that it would not interfere with the operations of the Department even though no bill were passed covering the five days to which I have referred, yet I think it advisable to make temporary provision rather than leave the matter undetermined.

If no gentleman desires to discuss the matter, I shall ask the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this proceeding is by unanimous consent; otherwise of course the bill would have to go under the rule to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, of course; but I do not think there will be any objection to this proceeding.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know what assurance we have that the Senate, not being willing to take such a bill as this for six months, would take it for thirty-one days.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I have no right to speak for the Senate in that particular. But it is for the House to do that which is its duty under the circumstances.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has great familiarity with the proceedings in the Senate on the subject of a naval appropriation bill; and we have learned there has been no agreement between the members of the conference committee on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. If the Senate is not willing to accept this bill our duty will have been done in passing it.

Mr. KEIFER. But we ought not to do an unnecessary thing. If there is a radical difference between the House and the Senate it ought to be settled. This piecemeal way of doing it is not quite up to the standard of legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. What does the gentleman from Ohio propose instead of this?

Mr KEIFER. I propose we go together on some basis which may lead to an agreement, and discuss what that agreement shall be.

Mr. RANDALL. But the House is to adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. It is not entirely to the credit of this Congress that we should not have been able to appropriate in the usual and ordinary way for the Navy. If we can not do it entirely we ought to come as near doing it as we can.

Mr. RANDALL. I am trying to get as near it as I can.

Mr. HAMMOND. There is no danger from Chili for thirty-one days.

Mr. KEIFER. If gentlemen are afraid of making big appropriations, we might as well appropriate from day to day. But that does not seem to me the way to run the great Navy of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. We have a good many examples to follow in this matter. I have introduced this bill so that there can not possibly be any embarrassment, and I hope the gentlemen on that side will not throw any obstacle in the way of giving the Navy all the money required up to the 31st of January.

Mr. KEIFER. There is always embarrassment, so far as the heads of these Departments are concerned, when they can not make arrangements for more than thirty-one days.

Mr. RANDALL. The Secretary of the Navy has repeatedly said to me and other gentlemen that it will be no embarrassment if this appropriation is continued for six months, and there has been no embarrassment in the conduct of the Navy for the past six months by reason of the legislation of the last year making this appropriation.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to make an issue with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But I understand the Naval Department has been embarrassed in making its purchases, having been only allowed to make its purchases for a half year instead of a whole year. I am informed that they have been embarrassed by this state of things from the beginning of the fiscal year up to this time, not so far embarrassed perhaps as materially to impair the efficiency of the Navy, but so as to cause some additional expense to the Government, and a very considerable amount of trouble to the officers of the Navy. But having said this much, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I will not offer any opposition to the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Ohio will tax his memory he will remember, I think, that exactly this action took place as to some of the appropriation bills during the time that he occupied the exalted place in the House which you, Mr. Speaker, now occupy.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not remember any such thing as this took place during that time. There was a little extension at the opening of a fiscal year at one time; but there was no such appropriation as this, so far as I remember, during the Forty-seventh Congress. There is, however, I think, a precedent for this in the Forty-sixth Congress. I believe there was in that Congress an exact precedent.

Mr. RANDALL. There are a great many instances of bills like this having been passed.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will say that he stands only on the precedents of the Forty-sixth Congress, I will not make the point that the bill should go to a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. In my recollection of what took place in the Forty-seventh Congress I am corroborated by gentlemen around me.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BEACH. Is not a yea-and-nay vote required on the passage of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Under what rule?

Mr. BEACH. Is not this a bill appropriating money?

The SPEAKER. But the rule applies only to general appropriation bills. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLS. Is it competent for the House to postpone the further consideration of the interstate-commerce bill until Tuesday, the 6th of January?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to postpone the consideration of any bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think any such motion is necessary.

Mr. HAMMOND. Would it not come up as the unfinished business when the House reassembles?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposed that the House should pass from the present consideration of the bill without any motion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] thereupon demanded the regular order, which compelled the Chair to state that the bill was still before the House.

Mr. MILLS. That was what I wanted to obviate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If we have a quorum I do not see why we should not go on with business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is before the House unless it is got rid of in some way.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will not insist on the call for the regular order. A great many gentlemen have bills to introduce and desire the action of the House on small matters which have been interfered with by the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the demand for the regular order so as to permit the introduction of bills.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask that a joint resolution of the Senate relating to the payment of laborers in the Government service on holidays be taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky did not withdraw his demand for the regular order for such a purpose as that; it was only withdrawn to permit the introduction of bills.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] calling up the resolution he has indicated.

HOLIDAYS FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays. I am satisfied that if the resolution be read no member will object to it. We are now ourselves about to take a two-weeks' holiday. This resolution simply provides that the employés of the navy-yard, Government Printing Office, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and other per diem employés of the Government shall be entitled to four or five holidays during the year without losing their pay for those days.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the employés of the navy-yard, Government Printing Office, Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and all other per diem employés of the Government on duty at Washington, or elsewhere in the United States, shall be allowed the following holidays, namely: The 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 4th day of July, the 25th day of December, and such days as may be designated by the President as days for national thanksgiving, and shall receive the same pay as on other days.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read three times.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 79, noes 58.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. At the request of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The question recurring on the passage of the joint resolution, it was passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OVERFLOWS IN CHIPPEWA RIVER, WISCONSIN.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7992) to provide for an inquiry into the causes of extraordinary overflows in the Chippewa River, in the State of Wisconsin, and to prevent a recurrence of the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GREENLEAF. On behalf of the Committee on Patents, I ask consent to introduce a resolution for present consideration.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 95, noes 38.

Several members called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were yeas 9, noes 105—less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will it be in order to have tellers on ordering the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the gentleman can get them. He has the right to call for tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before the vote is announced, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, in order to decide whether I will call for tellers or not. I understand that the Senate will, in all probability, agree to the resolution for a holiday recess; and I would like to hear from the other end of the Capitol on that subject. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Therefore I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered, only 4 voting therefor.

The SPEAKER (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.). Tellers are refused, and the yeas and nays are refused. The motion that the House adjourn is agreed to; and in accordance with its order already made, the House stands adjourned until Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROADHEAD: Petition and papers relating to the claim of Chaplain C. M. Blake—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: A bill to continue the improvement of the navigation of the Coosa River in Georgia and Alabama—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. DINGLEY: Petition of James Johnston, for arrears of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DUNN: Papers relating to the claim of Eli T. Diamond—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FORNEY: A bill making appropriation to continue the work at the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River, in the State of Alabama—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, a bill making appropriation to continue the work on the Coosa River in the States of Alabama and Georgia—to the same committee.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Petition of 55 citizens of Allegany County, Maryland, asking the passage of a bankrupt act—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petition of Machinists and Blacksmiths' Union, No. 2, of Detroit, Mich., protesting against the confirmation of John Fehrenbatch—to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of Charles Elliott, praying for the passage of a joint resolution relative to the registry of deaths, births, and marriages—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. RYAN: Petition of Western Miami Indians, asking to be reimbursed certain money unlawfully taken from them—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SEYMOUR: Memorial of the Bridgeport Board of Trade, favoring the passage of the bill known as the Lowell, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. J. M. TAYLOR: Petition of John A. Barnes, for compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of J. G. McFarlane, asking compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late war—to the same committee.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Papers relating to the claim of John Lappert—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petition of George P. Shelton, for compensation for property taken for the use of the Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claim of James Tucker—to the same committee.

The following petitions for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill with Senate amendments were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Pensions:

By Mr. CONNOLLY: Of J. Emmett O'Brien and 79 others, of Scranton, Pa.

By Mr. W. W. CULBERTSON: Of citizens of Foster, Bracken County, Kentucky.

By Mr. FUNSTON: Of citizens of Bourbon County, and of Thayer, Neosho County, Kansas.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Of 90 citizens of Sharpsburg, Washington County, Maryland.

By Mr. WASHBURN: Of 60 citizens and ex-soldiers of Hennepin County, Minnesota.

REPORTS OF GUN-FOUNDERY BOARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the supplementary report, dated December 20, 1884, made in pursuance of orders of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, by the gun-foundery board, appointed by me in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 22, 1884.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be considered at the present time:

Resolved by the Senate, That there be printed at the Government Printing Office the usual number of copies of the supplementary report of the gun-foundery board, dated December 20, 1884, and in connection therewith the same number of the report of the board of February 16, 1884.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. The resolution includes the supplementary report?

Mr. HALE. The resolution includes the supplementary report.

Mr. HAWLEY. The two reports should be printed in one pamphlet.

Mr. HALE. Under the resolution I have offered I suppose they will be printed together. That would be a more convenient way, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to modify the resolution so as not to make a double print?

Mr. MORRILL. The reports should be printed together.

Mr. HALE. The resolution is enough to carry that; it says "in connection therewith."

The resolution was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions adopted by the New York Leaf-Tobacco Board of Trade, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty between Spain and the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial very numerously signed by citizens, merchants, firms, owners of steam vessels, and other persons engaged in commerce and mining, mainly engaged in what is called the Lake Superior iron trade, remonstrating very strongly against the ratification of the Spanish reciprocity treaty, setting out in very clear and terse language the grounds of their opposition. In order that the Senate may have the benefit of the facts stated and suggestions made by the memorialists, which I believe are reliable, based upon their business operations, I ask that this memorial be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

HON. JOHN SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington:

The undersigned, representing iron-ore producing and transporting interests of the Northwest, whose products are mainly distributed from Lake Erie ports throughout the adjacent States, beg leave respectfully to call your attention to the terms of the proposed treaty with Spain in behalf of her West Indian dependencies as affecting American iron-ore production. The duty on iron ore is now 75 cents per ton—insufficient even now for a reasonable protection to the capital and the labor engaged in development of our American mines, and in the extensive transportation of their products to our furnaces.

The iron and steel industries of the United States, for obvious reasons, can never depend upon a foreign ore supply.

The reliance for cheap iron and steel must always be upon our American ore, and that, fortunately, may be obtained in abundant supply and in great variety of chemical constitution in every part of our country, provided the development of our mines be not retarded and discouraged by a policy which refuses to discriminate in favor of home interests.

Under the present rate of duty we are obliged to compete directly with some of the poorest paid labor in the world—in Spain and Africa—Spanish and African ores produced at a labor cost that would be humiliating and oppressive to the last degree to the American laborer, and which we do not ask him to accept. Even now hundreds of thousands of tons annually displace the products of our American mines.

Under the treaty, however, the American iron-ore producer is threatened with a removal of all protection.

Iron ore in Schedule A is on the free-list. In our relations with the Spanish West Indies hitherto the rate of duty on iron ore has not been of importance, because until recently there have been no importations. It is not well known, however, that Cuba has very extensive and valuable deposits of ore, and within the last year or two large investments of capital have been made for their development. The admission of these ores duty free, as provided in the treaty, would be a gross injustice and injury to our home production. Should a temporary or local advantage thereby be gained by two or three iron and steel manufacturing plants favorably situated near the Atlantic coast for the use of these Cuban ores, that could only operate to the injury of many Eastern and all Western, Northwestern, and Southern iron and steel interests. Such discrimination in favor of special interest to the injury of others in the same line of manufacture should, in our judgment, never be recognized in our tariff laws. Nor do we understand that it is even asked for by such special interests. The iron-ore producing interests of the country and the great body of iron and steel manufacturers as well are satisfied to stand upon a common level with respect to each other and to accept such conditions as local advantages for cheap production may give to each, but they are unwilling to consent to changes in rates of duty that will operate, as in this case, to a discrimination in favor of special interests at home and abroad. Iron ore is produced in every part of our country. The product last year was not less than 10,000,000 tons. Engaged in this business are vast capitals, and by it hundreds of thousands of laborers are furnished with remunerative employment. In a single section of the country—the Lake Superior region—in the mines, in the railroads necessary for moving their products to the lakes, in the transportation over the lakes and in the ore business of the railroads moving the ores from lower lake ports to furnaces in adjacent States are now employed $85,000,000 of capital, with all of labor occupation that such an amount of capital involves. In other sections of the country are similar connected and independent industries, whose safety and whose ability to furnish employment to labor is menaced by this proposed removal of the duty from Cuban ores. That removal would close many American mines. We do not ask the American laborer to live on the wages of the Spanish West Indies—ore mining 28 cents a day.

Although beyond the intended scope of this communication, we cannot refrain from referring to some general considerations in opposition to this treaty.

In return for open gates to a very small American export to these islands, with a decaying civilization, and whose laboring population is of the lowest type and with few wants, we are asked—a nation of 55,000,000 large consumers and consequently affording the best market in the world—to admit six-tenths of the entire exports of these islands free of duty; and in admitting free the great bulk of her sugar export and at greatly reduced duty her tobacco, we injure severely our own tobacco interest, and we not only destroy our cane-sugar production, but we render impossible the establishment of a beet-sugar industry in the Northern States—an end greatly to be desired as a diversification of our agriculture.

But iron ore and sugar and tobacco are only illustrative of the practical working of such a treaty. As in the case of these commodities the principle of protection to our home industries is contravened all through the schedules. A protective system admits free, unless duties are required for revenue, the raw materials for a home manufacture which do not compete with another home industry. But with exact justice it lays a duty protective on so-called raw materials of foreign production that do compete. This well-settled principle is in this treaty conspicuously violated.

The President in his annual message clearly states this rule, and, in his message transmitting the treaty to the Senate, quotes it in this language: "The conditions of these treaties should be the free admission of such merchandise as this country does not produce, in return for the admission free or under a favored scheme of duties of our own products." But in this treaty there is an absence, a conspicuous absence, of the very conditions which in the message of the President are stated to be essential. The principal exports of these islands coming in free and at a very low duty would compete, and that most injuriously, with a large number of our home productions. As in the case of tea and coffee, the foreign producer will save the amount of the duty. Sugar, tobacco, and the principal West Indian products will be no cheaper in our markets, but in this case, in addition to our loss of the revenue—very large—from these islands, there is the needless infliction of positive injury upon many of our home industries.

But what are the promised compensations to us for the destruction of some of our valuable industries and the injury of others and the relinquishment for the sole advantage of Spain and her dependencies of $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 of revenue.

We are promised a removal of some of the disabilities and restrictions to which our shipping interests are now subject in the trade with those islands and equal advantages in it with the Spanish flag; and yet is not the value of this concession greatly overestimated? Must not such a country remain, as she now is, a small consumer of those commodities which we most need a market for? Our total exports in 1883 to these islands were only $14,567,918. A high duty is still retained on our cereals, and our manufacturers will have to meet in Cuban markets, as they now do, the sharp competition of manufacturing Europe.

In respect to that competition also there seems to be no adequate discrimination in our favor.

We recognize the necessity of enlarged markets. The increasing volume of our products must be absorbed somewhere, but it would be a fatal policy to seek this abroad at the sacrifice of vital interests at home. Our best and largest market is the home market. The preservation and the enlargement of that is the first dictate of a true American policy. A successful external policy must start from that economic premise.

The proposed treaty, in our judgment, will not stand that test and should be rejected.

We therefore respectfully request, in behalf of most important interests we represent, your earnest efforts to that end.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of William F. Bartlett Post, No. 99, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, praying for the publication, in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, of photographic illustrations; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Eugene Dickinson, of Elliott, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act of Congress authorizing the payment to him of certain moieties of fines for information given by him to the Government of parties engaged in illicit trade in spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present certain petitions in favor of the ratification of what is commonly known as the Spanish treaty, from Motley & Sterling, of New York; the Pioneer Iron Works, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Jersey City Wheel Foundery and Machine Works, of Jersey City, N. J. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present memorials from cigar-makers of the city of Norwalk, Ohio, and the city of Columbus, Ohio, of the city of Cincinnati, and the city of Akron, Ohio, and of Massillon, Ohio, Germantown, Ohio, Sandusky, Ohio, and of a mass-meeting of cigar-makers of the city of New York, and also of the New York Leaf-Tobacco Board of Trade, all remonstrating against the ratification of the Spanish reciprocity treaty. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union, at Vincennes, Ind., remonstrating against the ratification of the reciprocity treaty between Spain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of the Western Miami Indians, praying to be reimbursed certain money alleged to have been unlawfully taken from them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONGER presented the petition of Knorr & Steffens, B. Landingham & Son, Charles Groesbeck, and Snook & Robinson, of Mount Clemens and Fraser, Macomb County, Michigan, praying for a modification of the sugar clause of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2485) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compensate clerks and employés for extra work performed in the exchange of bonds in the Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2486) granting a pension to William L. Clarke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2487) to establish an additional land district in Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (S. 2488) to remove the charge of desertion against William H. McBride, late private Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That Henry W. Hoffman, late collector of the port of Baltimore, have leave to withdraw his memorial and other papers, in his claim for relief as such collector, from the files of the Senate.

COMPILATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 1,000 copies of the compilation of the internal-revenue laws of the United States, with a history of the legislation in regard thereto from the organization of the Government to the present time, by D. R. Goodloe; of which 200 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 700 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 100 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays.

RIGHTS IN LAND GRANTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, commencing with Order of Business 338, being the bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of railroads and canals which shall be declared forfeited by act of Congress. The Chair will state that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] not now in his seat previously asked unanimous consent that this bill stand over, retaining its place. If there be no objection it will be again passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BECK. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senate and ask unanimous consent to have it carried out. I have been requested in one or two pension cases which have passed the House and have been reported by the Senate committee without amendment to endeavor to urge their passage before the Christmas holidays, and in one or two cases I said I thought it would surely be done. What I propose now is to ask unanimous consent to take up—I do not like to ask to take up one pension case, but the pension cases, the unobjected cases which have passed and have been reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he will favor me by withdrawing his request until the first matter on the Calendar is disposed of?

Mr. BECK. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It is a matter of which I have some knowledge as it comes from my State, and I am obliged to be absent after to-day. If the Senator will wait until that is disposed of I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. BECK. Certainly, I shall be very glad to do so. The only reason why I made the suggestion in regard to the pension cases was to get them passed before the holidays if I could.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The bill (S. 1235) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education, was announced as regularly in order.

Mr. HOAR. That I suppose will go over. That is not the bill I meant. It is the next but one.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SOUTHERN MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 13) to reappropriate and apply the amount appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, to pay certain Southern mail contractors was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator who reported that is absent. I suggest that it go over and retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that this joint resolution be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILBUR F. STEELE.

The bill (S. 1543) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the west half of section 16, in township 129 north, of range 73 west, containing three hundred and twenty acres, in the Bismarck district, Territory of Dakota, shall be granted and confirmed to Wilbur F. Steele, his heirs or assigns, of Steele, Dak., upon the payment to the United States for the land at the rate of $2.50 per acre.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, at the end of section 3 to add:

Said selections to be made according to legal subdivisions and contiguous.

So as to make the section read:

That upon the passage of this act the Territory of Dakota, through its proper officer, shall be, and is hereby, authorized to select as indemnity for said land, and in full satisfaction thereof, and for the purpose stated in section 1946 of the Revised Statutes, one half section, or three hundred and twenty acres, of public lands, at any office in said Territory, said selections to be made according to legal subdivisions, and contiguous.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not any written report.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps the Senator who reported it will explain it.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Michigan, and I suppose it will not be necessary to give him a recital of the facts, but I can explain it in a very few minutes.

Before the lands were surveyed, or at all events at a time when the boundaries were insufficiently marked, Mr. Steele went upon this land supposing it to be section 17 in place of section 16. He has placed upon the land a very large and valuable improvement, amounting to many thousands of dollars. He now asks to be authorized to purchase the land, which he expected to be able to do when he located upon it, and this bill gives the Territory of Dakota the right to select other lands in place of it.

Mr. CONGER. I see that I introduced the bill by request.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON.

Mr. VOORHEES. I see there are seven pension bills passed by the House which are on our Calendar reported from our committee without any amendment, and I should like to ask the Senate to consent to take them up and pass them.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made that request, but generously consented to defer it until after the disposition of the next case on the Calendar, as I am obliged to go away.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts was through with his case.

Mr. HOAR. I thought when I made the request that it was the next case on the Calendar. It is the one now coming up.

Mr. VOORHEES. I defer with pleasure. I thought the Senate had acted on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be announced.

The bill (S. 1331) making an appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment, in section 2, line 1, to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "forty-nine" before "thousand;" and after the word "thousand" to insert "and thirty-nine and ninety-five hundredths;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the judgment rendered in favor of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., against the United States, in the sum of $371,025, from March 1, 1867, to the date of payment.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $249,039.95 is hereby appropriated for the purposes set forth in section 1, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON March 17, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1331) making appropriations for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That on and prior to February 28, 1867, Julius F. Hartwell was cashier of the United States subtreasury in Boston, Mass. While acting as such cashier he embezzled a large amount of the Government's money by lending the same to the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., who were extensively engaged in stock speculations. As the time for the examination of the funds in the subtreasury approached, March 1, 1867, when Hartwell's accounts would have to be passed, some plan had to be devised by the guilty parties to prevent or delay exposure. The device resorted to and put in operation was to procure funds and assets of innocent third parties to be placed temporarily on deposit in the subtreasury till the examination was had, and then to be immediately withdrawn again, and thus tide Hartwell and his associates in the embezzlement over the crisis.

Edward Carter, the active financial member of said firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., who concocted this scheme with Hartwell, was a director in the First National Bank of Newton, and seems to have possessed not only the confidence of, but unlimited influence over, E. Porter Dyer, the cashier of said bank. By means of this confidence and influence, and in execution of his and Hartwell's fraudulent conspiracy, Carter procured from Dyer the money, bonds, securities, and checks of the First National Bank of Newton, to the amount of $371,025, which were deposited in the subtreasury on February 28, 1867, Hartwell giving a receipt therefor, as cashier, that the deposit was "to be returned on demand in governments, or bills, or its equivalent." This receipt being in the name of Mellon, Ward & Co., was immediately indorsed by Carter as follows: "Pay only to the order of E. Porter Dyer, jr., cashier," and signed, Mellon, Ward & Co.

This deposit of its funds and assets was made without the knowledge and consent of the president and directors of the First National Bank of Newton. Hartwell's default was discovered on the night of February 28, and on March 1, 1867, when Dyer presented the above receipt and demanded its redemption, payment was refused, and the bank's funds and securities were held and applied by the Government to make good Hartwell's default. The capital stock of the bank was $150,000. It was doing and for years had done a prosperous and profitable business, but this fraudulent misapplication and appropriation of its assets ruined the institution, and on March 11, 1867, it was placed in the hands of a receiver, and, to make good its losses and provide the means to discharge its debts, the stockholders were compelled to pay in a second time the amount of their respective holdings of its capital stock. On February 24, 1873, the First National Bank of Newton filed its petition in the Court of Claims against the United States to recover the amount of its funds and assets so deposited in the subtreasury, and appropriated by the Government. The case was heard in December, 1880, and judgment was rendered in favor of the bank January 24, 1881, for the full amount of principal claimed, namely, $371,025.

The full details of the conspiracy and transaction by which the Government, through the fraud of its agent, wrongfully got possession of the bank's assets are clearly set forth in 10 Court of Claims reports, page 519; 96 United States Supreme Court reports, 30, and 16 Court of Claims Reports, page 54, to which reference is here made for a more complete statement of the facts than hereinabove stated. In delivering the opinion of the Court of Claims in the bank's suit, Chief-Justice Drake characterized the taking of its assets as a "villainous scheme," and the transaction as "simply a case of a bank being robbed, and of its stolen assets being put into the hands of the cashier of the subtreasury for a purpose which by no possible view could in law be held to effect a transfer of the bank's right of property in them either to him or to the United States." That the United States could not derive a benefit from the fraudulent act of their cashier or lawfully withhold the funds thus obtained admitted of no question either in law or morals. After referring to many of the authorities on the question, the Supreme Court (96 United States Reports, page 36) say, in conclusion:

"But surely it ought to require neither argument nor authority to support the proposition, that where the money or property of an innocent person has gone into the coffers of the nation by means of a fraud to which its agent was a party, such money or property can not be held by the United States against the claim of the wronged and injured party. The agent was agent for no such purpose. His doings were vitiated by the underlying dishonesty and could confer no rights upon his principal."

On the 28th April, 1881, a duly certified copy of the bank's judgment against the United States was presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided by law. Before its payment the now Attorney-General of the United States, in March, 1881, entered an appeal to the Supreme Court. This appeal seems to have been taken for the purpose of enabling him to examine the case. After making such examination and finding the case undistinguishable from that reported in 96 United States Reports above cited, the appeal, which had been in the mean time entered in the Supreme Court, was, on his motion, dismissed in that court October 25, 1881.

Thereafter, on October 29, 1881, the sum of $260,000 was paid, on account of this judgment, by the Treasurer of the United States, that being the only amount available under the appropriation then existing. The balance of $111,025 was paid August 30, 1882.

Such is a brief history of the case. The bill under consideration proposes to pay the bank interest on the amount of its funds so taken and appropriated by the United States, from date of conversion to time of payment. The Court of Claims was not authorized to award such interest, its jurisdiction in the matter of "interest" being confined to cases of contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest. It will hardly be insisted that this restriction upon one of its tribunals settles either the question of the Government's liability or the measure of its duty in a case like the present, where the contract relation is not voluntarily assumed by the party making the claim. The Government may with propriety refuse to recognize any obligation to pay interest to those who voluntarily deal with it, without expressly stipulating for the payment of interest.

But the question of its obligation to make indemnity by the allowance of interest, where the creditor relation is forced upon the individual by the wrongful act of the Government or its agents, stands upon a different footing, and should be determined by the general principles of the public law and the rules of natural justice and equity applicable to the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Ordinarily, the Government can not and should not be made responsible, to the extent of individuals, for the wrongful acts of its officers or agents. But this rule can not be justly invoked to shield or protect the Government from the measure of responsibility applied to private persons, where it has adopted such wrongful acts and derived an advantage and benefit therefrom. Where the Government has profited by the fraud of its agent, why should it deny to the injured party the full redress that courts of equity would afford as between individuals and private corporations? In the jurisprudence of all civilized countries the general doctrine is well settled that any one—except a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice—who obtains possession of property which has been procured from the owner by fraudulent means or practices is converted by the courts into a trustee, and ordered to account as such; or, as stated by Perry on Trusts, section 166, the principle "denotes that the parties defrauded, or beneficially entitled, have the same right and remedies against him as they would be entitled to against an express trustee who had fraudulently committed a breach of trust." Whenever the principal adopts the fraudulent act of his agent, or attempts to reap an advantage therefrom, his liability is properly measured by this rule. Indeed (says Perry on Trusts, 172), the doctrine has been thus broadly stated:

"That when once a fraud has been committed, not only is the person who committed the fraud precluded from deriving any benefit from it, but every innocent person is so likewise, unless he has innocently acquired a subsequent interest; for a third person by seeking to derive any benefit under such a transaction, or to retain any benefit resulting therefrom, becomes particeps criminis, however innocent of the fraud in the beginning."

It would not admit of a moment's doubt that in the present case interest would have been awarded the bank as against the agent committing the fraud. It is also clear that as against any private principal occupying the position of the Government the bank could and would have received interest. Why should not the Government, standing as it does under this transaction in the attitude of a trustee if not a particeps criminis, be held to the same measure of responsibility and redress? Nothing short of this will meet the justice of the case or afford the equitable relief to which the bank is justly entitled. A great Government like ours, with unlimited resources and revenues at its command, should above all things deal justly with its citizens. It should not stand upon technicalities in withholding property or funds which may have wrongfully come into its possession. It should never make for itself a profit or secure and retain an advantage through the fraud of its agents or by any breach of trust which has worked a wrong and injury. It should in such cases make such reparation as its courts would enforce as between individuals.

The American counsel at Geneva successfully claimed interest upon the amounts awarded to the United States against Great Britain. The counsel for Great Britain, while objecting to the application of the principle allowing interest, distinguished between cases where, in their view, it should and should not be allowed, in language strikingly applicable here; and attention is called to it as being a concession, on the part of a party objecting to the allowance of interest, which covers the present case, as follows:

"Interest, in the proper sense of that word, can only be allowed where there is a principal debt of liquidated and ascertained amount detained and withheld by the debtor from the creditor after the time when it was absolutely due and ought to have been paid, the fault of the delay in payment resting with the debtor; or where the debtor has wrongfully taken possession of and exercised dominion over the property of the creditor. In the former case, from the time when the debt ought to have been paid, the debtor has had the use of the creditor's money, and may justly be presumed to have employed it for his own profit and advantage. He has thus made a gain corresponding with the loss which the creditor has sustained by being deprived, during the same period of time, of the use of his money; and it is evidently just that he should account to the creditor for the interest which the law takes as the measure of this reciprocal gain and loss. In the latter case, the principle is exactly the same. It is ordinarily to be presumed that the person who has wrongfully taken possession of the property of another has enjoyed the fruits of it; and if, instead of this, he has destroyed it or kept it unproductive, it is still just to hold him responsible for interest on its value, because his own acts, after the time when he assumed control over it, are the causes why it has remained unfruitful. In all these cases, it is the actual or virtual possession of the money or property belonging to another which is the foundation of the liability of interest. The person liable is either lucratus by the detention of what is not his own, or is justly accountable as if he were so."

In the case under consideration, the funds of the bank—an amount fixed and liquidated—have been wrongfully withheld for many years, during which the Government has retained and used them, and to that extent has made or saved interest, of which the bank throughout the same period lost such interest. In allowing interest at a low rate the bank will receive only (or less than) what it was unjustly deprived of, while the United States will only yield up what it has received or saved that rightfully belonged to the bank, for it can not be questioned that the use of the principal sum has put the Government in receipt of additional funds to the amount of the value of such use. The claim is thus brought within the general principle so clearly and forcibly stated in the above-quoted extract from the council of Great Britain.

In this statement of the proposition which should govern the present case it is hardly necessary to say that the committee do not wish to be understood as even suggesting that the same rule could or should be applied to that large class of cases known as war claims. They stand entirely upon a different footing. Every man, woman, and child residing, during the war, in the insurrectionary territory became thereby an enemy of the United States. The Government could have asserted against each and all of them the extremest measures conceded by the public law to belligerents. That it did not adopt this policy, but modified the harsher rules of war, by which it waived some of its belligerent rights, could not be made in any case the basis of a claim for interest, nor lay the ground for the payment of interest. Take, for illustration, the captured and abandoned property cases. This property and its proceeds, under the modern rules of war, could have been appropriated to the absolute use of the Government. Instead of pursuing this course, the Government, in a spirit of liberality, adopted the generous policy of making itself a depository of these funds, to be held for the benefit of the real owners. The proposition to allow interest on such claims should not and would not be entertained for a moment.

It can not be properly urged as an objection to this claim for interest that the bank should be held responsible to some extent for the unfaithfulness of the cashier whom it has selected and intrusted with certain well-defined duties in respect of its funds and assets. No want of care is shown in making the selection. There was nothing in his previous conduct to excite suspicion or put the bank upon inquiry or notice so as to charge it with any degree of negligence in retaining him in its employ. The doctrine of contributory negligence is sometimes looked to and considered in the determination of the better equity as between two innocent parties who have been defrauded by a third party who has been trusted by both. If there had been no previous default on the part of Hartwell, and he had on the night of February 28, 1867, embezzled the funds and assets of the bank that day deposited with him by Carter and Dyer, the Government and the bank might then have occupied the position of two innocent parties, whose equities would have to be determined and settled to some extent by the question of negligence in the employment of unfaithful agents.

But that is not the present case. The Government had already lost its money by the previous embezzlement of its cashier of the subtreasury, and then, through the corrupt influence of that same agent and his confederate, the bank's agent is tempted, by a "villainous scheme," into a breach of his trust, by means of which the Government obtains possession of the bank's entire assets, and wrongfully appropriates them in making good its previous losses. It would be shocking to every sense of right and justice for the Government now to urge that the unfaithfulness of the bank's trusted agent was a bar or valid defense to its liability and duty to refund either the principal or interest of the funds so procured and converted to its own use. Your committee have too much regard for the honor and good name of the Government to allow it to occupy a position so questionable. It should be observed, too, that the decision of its own courts declaring that the Government could not rightfully hold the assets so fraudulently obtained, has really disposed of this question of negligence, which applied with equal force to the recovery of the principal as to the interest.

To the objection that the allowance of this claim for interest will establish a bad precedent, the reply of Mr. Sumner to a similar objection is a complete answer:

"If the claim is just, the precedent of paying it is one which our Government should wish to establish. Honesty and justice are not precedents of which either Government or individuals should be afraid." (Senate Report No. 4, Forty-first Congress, first session, page 10.)

But it is respectfully submitted that there are abundant precedents, both in the judicial and in the legislative branches of the Government, to support the present application for the allowance of interest. The prevalent idea that "the Government never pays interest" has grown up from the practice of the Departments, which do not allow interest except where it is specially provided for in cases of contracts or expressly authorized by law. But this usage and custom of the Executive Departments can not be properly regarded as the settled rule and policy of the Government, for its action upon the subject of interest has not from the earliest times conformed to such usage. On the contrary, it will be found, upon an examination of the precedents where Congress has passed acts for the relief of private citizens, that in almost every case, except those growing out of the late war, Congress has directed the payment of interest where the United States had withheld a sum of money which had been decided by competent authority to be due, or where the amount due was ascertained, fixed, and certain. The highest court of the country has also affirmed this to be not only the practice of the Government but the measure of its duty. Thus, in 15 Wallace, page 77, where the suit was against a United States collector for the recovery of taxes illegally collected, the Supreme Court used the following language upon the subject of interest allowed on the claim, namely:

"The third exception is to the instruction that if the jury found for plaintiff they might add interest. This was not contested upon the argument, and we think it clearly correct. The ground for the refusal to allow interest is the presumption that the Government is always ready and willing to pay its ordinary debts. Where an illegal tax has been collected the citizen who has paid it and has been obliged to bring suit against the collector is entitled to interest in the event of recovery from the time of the alleged exaction."

On June 8, 1872, Congress referred the claim of the heirs of Francis Vigo to the Court of Claims, in the following language:

"The claim of the heirs and legal representatives of Col. Francis Vigo, deceased, late of Terre Haute, Ind., for money and supplies furnished the troops under command of General George Rogers Clarke, in the year 1778, during the Revolutionary war, be, and the same hereby is, referred, along with all the papers and official documents belonging thereto, to the Court of Claims, with full jurisdiction to adjust and settle the same; and in making such adjustment and settlement, the said court shall be governed by the rules and regulations heretofore adopted by the United States in the settlement of like cases, giving proper consideration to official acts, if any have heretofore been had in connection with this claim, and without regard to the statutes of limitation."

The Court of Claims allowed the claim with interest thereon from the time it accrued, and, among other facts, found that—

"No rules and regulations have heretofore been adopted by the United States in the settlement of like cases except such as may be inferred from the policy of Congress when passing private acts for the relief of various persons. When passing such private acts, Congress has allowed interest upon the claim up to the time that the relief was granted."

The Attorney-General appealed from this judgment, awarding interest, but the decision of the court below was affirmed by the Supreme Court at the October term, 1875. (See 91 U. S. Rep., p. 443 et seq.) In delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Miller says:

"It has been the general rule of the officers of Government, in adjusting and allowing unliquidated and disputed claims against the United States, to refuse to give interest. That this rule is sometimes at variance with that which governs the acts of private citizens in a court of justice would not authorize us to depart from it in this case. The rule, however, is not uniform; and especially is it not so in regard to claims allowed by special acts of Congress, or referred by such acts to some Department or officer for settlement."

This was said in reference to unliquidated and unadjusted claims. Where the Government, by and through the fraud of its agents, gets possession and withholds from the rightful owner an ascertained, fixed, and certain amount, the claim for interest certainly stands upon higher equitable grounds than in the cases cited. The finding by the Court of Claims that the policy of the Government, as shown by the general rule pursued by Congress in passing acts for the relief of private claims, was to allow interest, is supported by the precedents.

Your committee, upon this proposition, beg leave to refer to and adopt this portion of House Report 391, Forty-third Congress, first session, which discusses the subject of interest as follows:

"THE OBLIGATION TO PAY INTEREST ON THE AMOUNT AWARDED THE CHOCTAW NATION.

"Your committee have given this question a most careful examination, and are obliged to admit and declare that the United States can not, in equity and justice, nor without national dishonor, refuse to pay interest upon the moneys so long withheld from the Choctaw Nation. Some of the reasons which force us to this conclusion are as follows:

"1. The United States acquired the lands of the Choctaw Nation on account of which the said award was made on the 27th day of September, 1830, and it has held them for the benefit of its citizens ever since.

"2. The United States had in its Treasury, many years prior to the 1st day of January, 1859, the proceeds resulting from the sale of the said lands, and have enjoyed the use of such moneys from that time until now.

"3. The award in favor of the Choctaw Nation was an award under a treaty, and made by a tribunal whose adjudication was final and conclusive. (Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters, 193.)

"4. The obligations of the United States, under its treaties with the Indian nations, have been declared to be equally sacred with those made by treaties with foreign nations. (Worcester vs. The State of Georgia, 6 Peters, 582.) And such treaties, Mr. Justice Miller declares, are to be construed liberally. (The Kansas Indians, 5 Wall., 737-760.)

"5. The engagments and obligations of a treaty are to be interpreted in accordance with the principles of the public law, and not in accordance with any municipal code or executive regulation. No statement of this proposition can equal the clearness or force with which Mr. Webster declares it in his opinion on the Florida claims, attached to the report in the case of Letitia Humphreys (Senate report No. 93, first session Thirty-sixth Congress, page 16). Speaking of the obligation of a treaty, he said:

"'A treaty is the supreme law of the land. It can neither be limited nor restrained, nor modified, nor altered. It stands on the ground of national contract, and is declared by the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land, and this gives it a character higher than any act of ordinary legislation. It enjoys an immunity from the operation and effect of all such legislation.

"'A second general proposition, equally certain and well established, is that the terms and the language used in a treaty are always to be interpreted according to the law of nations, and not according to any municipal code. This rule is of universal application. When two nations speak to each other they use the language of nations. Their intercourse is regulated, and their mutual agreements and obligations are to be interpreted by that code only which we usually denominate the public law of the world. The public law is not one thing at Rome, another at London, and a third at Washington. It is the same in all civilized States; everywhere speaking with the same voice and the same authority.'

"Again, in the same opinion, Mr. Webster used the following language:

"'We are construing a treaty, a solemn compact between nations. This compact between nations, this treaty, is to be construed and interpreted throughout its whole length and breadth, in its general provisions, and in all its details, in every phrase, sentence, word, and syllable in it, by the settled rules of the law of nations. No municipal code can touch it, no local municipal law affect it, no practice of an administrative department come near it. Over all its terms, over all its doubts, over all its ambiguities, if it have any, the law of nations "sits arbitress."'

"6. By the principles of the public law interest is always allowed as indemnity for the delay of payment of an ascertained and fixed demand. There is no conflict of authority upon this question among the writers on public law.

"This rule is laid down by Rutherford in these terms:

"'In estimating the damages which any one has sustained, when such things as he has a perfect right to are unjustly taken from him, or withholden, or intercepted, we are to consider not only the value of the thing itself, but the value likewise of the fruits or profits that might have arisen from it. He who is the owner of the thing is likewise the owner of the fruits or profits. So that it is as properly a damage to be deprived of them as it is to be deprived of the thing itself.' (Rutherford's Institutes, Book I, chap. 17, sec. 5.)

"In laying down the rule for the satisfaction of injuries in the case of reprisals, in making which the strictest caution is enjoined not to transcend the clearest rules of justice, Mr. Wheaton, in his work on the law of nations, says.

"'If a nation has taken possession of that which belongs to another, if it refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury or to give adequate satisfaction for it, the latter may seize something of the former and apply it to [his] its advantage, till it obtains payment of what is due, together with interest and damages.' (Wheaton on International Law, p. 341.)

"A great writer, Domat, thus states the law of reason and justice on this point:

"'It is a natural consequence of the general engagement to do wrong to no one that they who cause any damages by failing in the performance of that engagement are obliged to repair the damage which they have done. Of what nature soever the damage may be, and from what cause soever it may proceed, he who is answerable for it ought to repair it by an amende proportionable either to his fault or to his offense or other cause on his part, and to the loss which has happened thereby.' (Domat. Part I, Book III, Tit. V., 1900, 1903.)

"'Interest' is, in reality, in justice, in reason, and in law, too, a part of the debt due. It includes, in Pothier's words, the loss which one has suffered, and the gain which he has failed to make. The Roman law defines it as quantum mea interfuit; id est, quantum mihi abest, quantumque lucraci portui. The two elements of it were termed lucrum cessans et damnum emergens. The payment of both is necessary to a complete indemnity.

"Interest, Domat says, is the reparation or satisfaction which he who owes a sum of money is bound to make to his creditor for the damage which he does him by not paying him the money he owes him.

"It is because of the universal recognition of the justice of paying, for the retention of moneys indisputably due and payable immediately, a rate of interest considered to be a fair equivalent for the loss of its use, that judgments for money everywhere bear interest. The creditor is deprived of this profit, and the debtor has it. What greater wrong could the law permit than that the debtor should be at liberty indefinitely to delay payment, and, during the delay, have the use of the creditor's moneys for nothing? They are none the less the creditor's moneys because the debtor wrongfully withholds them. He holds them, in reality and essentially, in trust; and a trustee is always bound to pay interest upon money so held.

"In closing these citations from the public law, the language of Chancellor Kent seems eminently appropriate. He says: 'In cases where the principal jurists agree, the presumption will be very great in favor of the solidity of their maxims, and no civilized nation that does not arrogantly set all ordinary law and justice at defiance will venture to disregard the uniform sense of established writers on international law.'

"7. The practice of the United States in discharging obligations resulting from treaty stipulations has always been in accord with these well-established principles. It has exacted the payment of interest from other nations in all cases where the obligation to make payment resulted from treaty stipulations, and it has acknowledged that obligation in all cases where a like liability was imposed upon it."

The most important and leading cases which have occurred are those which arose between this country and Great Britain; the first under the treaty of 1794, and the other under the first article of the treaty of Ghent. In the latter case the United States, under the first article of the treaty, claimed compensation for slaves and other property taken away from the country by the British forces at the close of the war in 1815. A difference arose between the two governments which was submitted to the arbitrament of the Emperor of Russia, who decided that "the United States of America are entitled to a just indemnification from Great Britain for all private property carried away by the British forces." A joint commission was appointed for the purpose of hearing the claims of individuals under this decision. At an early stage of the proceedings the question arose as to whether interest was a part of that "just indemnification" which the decision of the Emperor of Russia contemplated. The British commissioner denied the obligation to pay interest. The American commissioner, Langdon Cheves, insisted upon its allowance, and in the course of his argument upon this question said:

"Indemnification means a reimbursement of a loss sustained. If the property taken away on the 17th of February, 1815, were returned now uninjured it would not reimburse the loss sustained by the taking away and consequent detention; it would not be an indemnification. The claimant would still be unindemnified for the loss of the use of his property for ten years, which considered as money is nearly equivalent to the original value of the principal thing."

Again he says:

"If interest be an incident usually attendant on the delay of payment of debts, damages are equally an incident attendant on the withholding an article of property."

In consequence of this disagreement the commission was broken up, but the claims were subsequently compromised by the payment of $1,204,960, instead of $1,250,000 as claimed by Mr. Cheves; and of the sum paid by Great Britain $418,000 was expressly for interest.

An earlier case, in which this principle of interest was involved, arose under the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, in which there was a stipulation on the part of the British Government in relation to certain losses and damages sustained by American merchants and other citizens, by reason of the illegal or irregular capture of their vessels or other property by British cruisers; and the seventh article provided in substance that "full and complete compensation for the same will be made by the British Government to the said claimants."

A joint commission was instituted under this treaty which sat in London, and by which these claims were adjudicated. Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Gore were commissioners on the part of the United States, and Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey on the part of Great Britain; and it is believed that in all instances this commission allowed interest as a part of the damage. In the case of The Betsey, one of the cases which came before the board, Dr. Nicholl stated the rule of compensation as follows:

"'To reimburse the claimants the original cost of their property, and all the expenses they have actually incurred, together with the interest on the whole amount, would, I think, be a just and adequate compensation. This, I believe, is the measure of compensation usually made by all belligerent nations, and accepted by all neutral nations, for losses, costs, and damages occasioned by illegal captures.' (Vide Wheaton's Life of Pinckney, page 198; also 265, note, and page 371.)

"By a reference to the American State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. 2, pages 119, 120, it will be seen by a report of the Secretary of State of the 16th February, 1798, laid before the House of Representatives, that interest was awarded and paid on such of these claims as had been submitted to the award of Sir William Scott and Sir John Nicholl, as it was in all cases by the board of commissioners. In consequence of some difference of opinion between the members of this commission, their proceedings were suspended until 1802, when a convention was concluded between the two governments, and the commission reassembled, and then a question arose as to the allowance of interest on the claims during the suspension. This the American commissioners claimed, and though it was at first resisted by the British commissioners, yet it was finally yielded, and interest was allowed and paid. (See Mr. King's three letters to the Secretary of State, of 25th March, 1803, 23d April, 1803, and 30th April, 1803, American State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. 2, pages 387 and 388.)

"Another case in which this principle was involved arose under the treaty of the 27th October, 1795, with Spain; by the twenty-first article of which, 'in order to terminate all differences on account of the losses sustained by citizens of the United States in consequence of their vessels and cargoes having been taken by the subjects of his Catholic Majesty during the late war between Spain and France, it is agreed that all such cases shall be referred to the final decision of commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner,' &c. The commissioners were to be chosen, one by the United States, one by Spain, and the two were to choose a third, and the award of the commissioners, or any two of them, was to be final, and the Spanish Government to pay the amount in specie.

"This commission awarded interest as part of the damages. (See American State Papers, vol. 2, Foreign Relations, page 283.) So in the case of claims of American citizens against Brazil, settled by Mr. Tudor, United States minister, interest was claimed and allowed. (See Ex. Doc., first session Twenty-fifth Congress, House Reps., Doc. 32, page 249.)

"Again, in the convention with Mexico of the 11th April, 1839, by which provision was made by Mexico for the payment of claims of American citizens for injuries to persons and property by the Mexican authorities, a mixed commission was provided for, and this commission allowed interest in all cases. (House Ex. Doc. 291, Twenty-seventh Congress, second session.)

"So also under the treaty with Mexico of February 2, 1848, the board of commissioners for the adjustment of claims under that treaty allowed interest in all cases from the origin of the claim until the day when the commission expired.

"So also under the convention with Colombia, concluded February 10, 1864, the commission for the adjudication of claims under that treaty allowed interest in all cases as a part of the indemnity.

"So under the recent convention with Venezuela, the United States exacted interest upon the awards of the commission, from the date of the adjournment of the commission until the payment of the awards.

"The mixed American and Mexican commission, now in session here, allows interest in all cases from the origin of the claim, and the awards are payable with interest.

"Other cases might be shown in which the United States or their authorized diplomatic agents have claimed interest in such cases, or where it has been paid in whole or in part. (See Mr. Russell's letter to the Count de Engstein of October 5, 1818, American State Papers, vol. 4, p. 639, and proceedings under the convention with the Two Sicilies of October, 1832, Elliot's Dip. Code, p. 625.)

"It can hardly be necessary to pursue these precedents further. They sufficiently and clearly show the practice of this Government with foreign nations, or with claimant under treaties.

"Eighth. The practice of the United States in its dealings with the various Indian tribes or nations has been in harmony with these principles.

"In all cases where money belonging to Indian nations has been retained by the United States, it has been so invested as to produce interest, for the benefit of the nation to which it belongs; and such interest is annually paid to the nation who may be entitled to receive it.

"Ninth. The United States in adjusting the claim of the Cherokee Nation for a balance due as purchase-money upon lands ceded by that nation to the United States in 1835, allowed interest upon the balance due them, being $189,422.76, until the same was paid.

"The question was submitted to the Senate of the United States, as to whether interest should be allowed them. The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, in their report upon this subject, used the following language:

"'By the treaty of August, 1846, it was referred to the Senate to decide, and that decision to be final, whether the Cherokees shall receive interest on the sums found due them from a misapplication of their funds to purposes with which they were not chargeable, and on account of which improper charges the money has been withheld from them. It has been the uniform practice of this Government to pay and demand interest in all transactions with foreign governments, which the Indian tribes have always been said to be, both by the Supreme Court and all other branches of our Government, in all matters of treaty or contract. The Indians, relying upon the prompt payment of their dues, have, in many cases, contracted debts upon the faith of it, upon which they have paid, or are liable to pay, interest. If, therefore, they do not now receive interest on their money so long withheld from them they will in effect have received nothing.' (Senate Report No. 176, first session Thirty-first Congress, p. 78.)

"Tenth. That upon an examination of the precedents where Congress has passed acts for the relief of private citizens it will be found that in almost every case Congress has directed the payment of interest where the United States had withheld a sum of money which had been decided by competent authority to be due, or where the amount due was ascertained, fixed, and certain.

"The following precedents illustrate and enforce the correctness of this assertion and sustain this proposition:

"1. An act approved January 14, 1793, provided that lawful interest from the 16th of May, 1776, shall be allowed on the sum of $200 ordered to be paid to Return J. Meigs and the legal representatives of Christopher Greene, deceased, by a resolve of the United States in Congress assembled on the 28th of September, 1785. (6 Stats. at Large, page 11.)

"2. An act approved May 31, 1794, providing for a settlement with Arthur St. Clair, for expenses while going from New York to Fort Pitt and till his return, and for services in the business of Indian treaties, and 'allowed interest on the balance found to be due him.' (6 Stats. at Large, page 16.)

"3. An act approved February 27, 1795, authorized the officers of the Treasury to issue and deliver to Angus McLean, or his duly authorized attorney, certificates for the amount of $254.43, bearing interest at 6 per cent., from the 1st of July, 1783, being for his services in the corps of sappers and miners during the late war. (6 Stats. at Large, p. 20.)

"4. An act approved January 23, 1798, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay General Kosciusko an interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the sum of $12,280.54, the amount of a certificate due to him from the United States from the 1st of January, 1793, to the 31st of December, 1797. (6 Stats. at Large, p. 32.)

"5. An act approved May 3, 1802, provided that there be paid Fulwar Skipwith the sum of $4,550, advanced by him for the use of the United States, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st of November, 1795, at which time the advance was made. (6 Stats. at Large, p. 48.)

"6. An act for the relief of John Coles, approved January 14, 1804, authorized the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to liquidate the claim of John Coles, owner of the ship Grand Turk, heretofore employed in the service of the United States, for the detention of said ship at Gibraltar from the 10th of May to the 4th of July, 1801, inclusive, and that he be allowed demurrage at the rate stipulated in the charter-party, together with the interest thereon. (6 Stat. at L., p. 50.)

"7. An act approved March 3, 1807, provided for a settlement of the accounts of Oliver Pollock, formerly commercial agent for the United States at New Orleans, allowing him certain sums and commissions, with interest until paid. (6 Stat. at L., p. 65.)

"8. An act for the relief of Stephen Sayre, approved March 3, 1807, provided that the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to settle the account of Stephen Sayre, as secretary of legation at the court of Berlin, in the year 1777, with interest on the whole sum until paid. (6 Stat. at L., p. 65.)

"9. An act to, approved April 35, 1810, directed the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the account of Moses Young, as secretary of legation to Holland in 1780, and providing that after the deduction of certain moneys paid him, the balance, with interest thereon, should be paid. (6 Stat. at L., page 89.)

"10. An act approved May 1, 1810, for the relief of P. C. L'Enfant, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to him the sum of $666, with legal interest thereon from March 1, 1792, as a compensation for his services in laying out the plan of the city of Washington. (6 Stat. at L., page 92.)

"11. An act approved January 10, 1812, provided that there be paid to John Burnham the sum of $126.72, and the interest on the same since the 30th of May, 1796, which, in addition to the sum allowed him by the act of that date, is to be considered a reimbursement of the money advanced by him for his ransom from captivity in Algiers. (6 Stat. at L., page 101.)

"12. An act approved July 1, 1812, for the relief of Anna Young, required the War Department to settle the account of Col. John Durkee, deceased, and to allow said Anna Young, his sole heiress and representative, said seven years' half pay, and interest thereon. (6 Stat. at L., page 110.)

"13. An act approved February 25, 1813, provided that there be paid to John Dixon the sum of $329.84, with 6 per cent. per annum interest thereon from the 1st of January, 1785, "being the amount of a final-settlement certificate, No. 596, issued by Andrew Dunscomb, late commissioner of accounts for the State of Virginia, on the 23d of December, 1786, to Lucy Dixon, who transferred the same to John Dixon. (6 Stat. at L., page 117.)

"14. An act approved February 25, 1813, required the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the account of John Murray, representative of Dr. Henry Murray, and that he be allowed the amount of three loan-certificates for $1,000, with interest from the 29th of March, 1782, issued in the name of said Murray, signed Francis Hopkinson, treasurer of loans. (6 Stat. at L., page 117.)

"15. An act approved March 3, 1813, directed the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Samuel Lapsley, deceased, and that they be allowed the amount of two final-settlement certificates, No. 78446, for $1,000, and No. 78447, for $1,300, and interest from the 22d day of March, 1783, issued in the name of Samuel Lapsley, by the commissioner of Army accounts for the United States on the 1st day of July, 1784. (6 Stat. at L., p. 119.)

"16. An act approved April 13, 1814, directed the officers of the Treasury to settle the account of Joseph Brevard, and that he be allowed the amount of a final-settlement certificate for $183.23, dated February 1, 1785, and bearing interest from the 1st of January, 1783, issued to said Brevard by John Pierce, commissioner for settling Army accounts. (6 Stat. at L., p. 134.)

"17. An act approved April 18, 1814, directed the receiver of public moneys at Cincinnati to pay the full amount of moneys, with interest, paid by Dennis Clark, in discharge of the purchase-money for a certain fractional section of land purchased by said Clark. (6 Stat. at L., 141.)

"18. An act for the relief of William Arnold, approved February 2, 1815, allowed interest on the sum of $600 due him from January 1, 1783. (6 Stat. at L., 146.)

"19. An act approved April 26, 1816, directed the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Joseph Wheaton the sum of $836.42, on account of interest due him from the United States upon $1,600.84, from April 1, 1807, to December 21, 1815, pursuant to the award of George Youngs and Elias B. Caldwell, in a controversy between the United States and the said Joseph Wheaton. (6 Stat. at L., 166.)

"20. An act approved April 26, 1816, authorized the liquidation and settlement of the claim of the heirs of Alexander Roxburgh, arising on a final-settlement certificate issued on the 18th of August, 1784, for $480.87, by John Pierce, commissioner for settling Army accounts, bearing interest from the 1st of January, 1782. (6 Stat. at L., 167.)

"21. An act approved April 14, 1818, authorized the accounting officer of the Treasury Department 'to review the settlement of the account of John Thompson,' made under the authority of an act approved the 11th of May, 1812, and 'to allow the said John Thompson interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the 4th of March, 1787, to the 20th of May, 1812, on the sum which was found due to him, and paid under the act aforesaid.' (6 Stat. at L., 208.)

"22. An act approved May 11, 1820, directed the proper officers of the Treasury to pay to Samuel B. Beall the amount of two final-settlement certificates issued to him on the 1st day of February, 1785, for his services as a lieutenant in the Army of the United States during the Revolutionary war, together with interest on the said certificates, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the time they bore interest, respectively, which said certificates were lost by the said Beall, and remain yet outstanding and unpaid. (6 Laws of U. S., 510; 6 Stat. at L., 249.)

"23. An act approved May 15, 1820, required that there be paid to Thomas Leiper the specie value of four loan-office certificates, issued to him by the commissioner of loans for the State of Pennsylvania, on the 27th of February, 1779, for $1,000 each; and also the specie value of two loan certificates, issued to him by the said commissioner on the 2d day of March, 1779, for $1,000 each, with interest at 6 per cent. annually. (6 Stat. at L., 252.)

"24. An act approved May 7, 1822, provided that there be paid to the legal representatives of John Guthry, deceased, the sum of $123.30, being the amount of a final-settlement certificate, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 1st day of January, 1788. (6 Stat. at L., 269.)

"25. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James McClung, approved March 3, 1823, allowed interest on the amount due at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 1, 1788. (6 Stat. at L., 284.)

"26. An act approved March 3, 1823, for the relief of Daniel Seward, allowed interest to him for money paid to the United States for land to which the title failed, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from January 29, 1814. (6 Stat. at L., 286.)

"27. An act approved May 5, 1824, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Amasa Stetson the sum of $6,215, 'being for interest on moneys advanced by him for the use of the United States, and on warrants issued in his favor, in the years 1814 and 1815, for his services in the Ordnance and Quartermaster's Department, for superintending the making of Army clothing and for issuing the public supplies.' (6 Stat. at L., 298.)

"28. An act approved March 3, 1824, directed the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the claim of Stephen Arnold, David and George Jenks, for the manufacture of 3,925 muskets, with interest thereon from the 26th day of October, 1813. (6 Stat. at L., 331.)

"29. An act approved May 20, 1826, directed the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the claim of John Stemman and others, for the manufacture of 4,100 stand of arms, and to allow interest on the amount due from October 26, 1813. (6 Stat. at L., 345.)

"30. An act approved May 20, 1826, for the relief of Ann D. Taylor, directed the payment to her of the sum of $354.15, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from December 30, 1786, until paid. (6 Stat. at L., 351.)

"31. An act approved March 3, 1827, provided that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury were authorized to pay to B. J. V. Valkenburg the sum of $597.24, 'being the amount of fourteen indents of interest, with interest thereon from the 1st of January, 1791, to the 31st of December, 1826.' (6 Stat. at L., 365.)

"In this case the United States paid interest on interest.

"32. An act approved May 19, 1828, provided that there be paid to the legal representatives of Patience Gordon the specie value of a certificate issued in the name of Patience Gordon by the commissioner of loans for the State of Pennsylvania, on the 7th of April, 1778, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1788. (7 Stat. at L., p. 378.)

"33. An act approved May 29, 1830, required the Treasury Department 'to settle the accounts of Benjamin Wells, as deputy commissary of issues at the magazine at Monster Mills, in Pennsylvania, under John Irvin, deputy commissary-general of the Army of the United States, in said State, in the Revolutionary war;' and that 'they credit him with the sum of $574.04, as payable February 9, 1779, and $326.67, payable July 20, 1780, in the same manner, and with such interest, as if these sums, with their interest from the times respectively as aforesaid, had been subscribed to the loan of the United States.' (6 Stats. at Large, 447.)

"34. An act approved May 19, 1832, for the relief of Richard G. Morris, provided for the payment to him of two certificates issued to him by Timothy Pickering, quartermaster-general, with interest thereon from the 1st of September, 1781. (6 States. at Large, 486.)

"35. An act approved July 4, 1832, for the relief of Aaron Snow, a Revolutionary soldier, provided for the payment to him of two certificates issued by John Pierce, late commissioner of Army accounts, and dated in 1784, with interest thereon. (6 Stats. at Large, 503.)

"36. An act approved July 4, 1832, provided for the payment to W. P. Gibbs of a final-settlement certificate dated January 30, 1784, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 1st of January, 1783, up to the passage of the act. This act went behind the final certificate and provided for the payment of interest anterior to its date. (6 Stats. at Large, 504.)

"37. An act approved July 14, 1832, directed the payment to the heirs of Ebenezer L. Warren of certains sums of money illegally demanded and received from the United States from the said Warren as one of the sureties of Daniel Evans, formerly collector of direct taxes, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from September 9, 1820. (6 Stats. at Large, 373.)

"38. An act for the relief of Hartwell Vick, approved July 14, 1832, directed the accounting officers of the Treasury to refund to the said Vick the money paid by him to the United States for a certain tract of land which was found not to be property of the United States, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 23d day of May, 1818. (6 Stats. at Large, 523.)

"39. An act approved June 18, 1834, for the relief of Martha Bailey and others, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the parties therein named the sum of $4,837.61, being the amount of interest upon the sum of $200,000, part of a balance due from the United States to Elbert Anderson on the 26th day of October, 1814; also the further sum of $9,595.36, being the amount of interest accruing from the deferred payment of warrants issued for balances due from the United States to said Anderson from the date of such warrants until the payment thereof; also the further sum of $2,018.50, admitted to be due from the United States to the said Anderson by a decision of the Second Comptroller, with interest on the sum last mentioned from the period of such decision until paid. (6 Stats. at Large, 562.)

"40. An act approved June 10, 1834, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay balance of damages recovered against William C. H. Waddell, United States marshal for the southern district of New York, for the illegal seizure of a certain importation of brandy, on behalf of the United States, with legal interest on the amount of said judgment from the time the same was paid by the said Waddell. (6 Stats. at Large, 594.)

"41. An act approved February 17, 1836, directed the payment of the sum therein named to Marinus W. Gilbert, being the interest on money advanced by him to pay off troops in the service of the United States, and not repaid when demanded. (6 Stats. at Large, 622.)

"42. An act approved February 17, 1836, for the relief of the executor of Charles Wilkins, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the said executor for interest on a liquidated demand in favor of Jonathan Taylor, James Morrison, and Charles Wilkins, who were lessees of the United States of the salt works in the State of Illinois. (6 Stats at Large, 626.)

"43. An act approved July 2, 1836, for the relief of the legal representatives of David Caldwell, directed the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of the said David Caldwell for fees and allowances, certified by the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, for official services to the United States, and to pay on that account the sum of $496.38, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 25th day of November, 1830, till paid. (6 Stats. at Large, 664.)

"44. An act approved July 2, 1836, provided that there be paid Don Carlos Delossus interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on $333, being the amount allowed him under the act of July 14, 1832, for his relief, on account of moneys taken from him at the capture of Baton Rouge, La., on the 23d day of September, 1810, being the interest to be allowed from the said 23d day of September, 1810, to the 14th day of July, 1832. (6 Stats. at Large, 672.)

"In this case the interest was directed to be paid four years after the principal had been satisfied and discharged.

"45. An act approved July 7, 1838, provided that the proper officers of the Treasury be directed to settle the accounts of Richard Harrison, formerly consular agent of the United States at Cadiz, in Spain, and to allow him, among other items, the interest on the money advanced, under agreement with the minister of the United States in Spain, for the relief of destitute and distressed seamen and for their passages to the United States from the time the advances, respectively, were made to the time at which the said advances were reimbursed. (6 Stats. at Large, 734.)

"46. An act approved August 11, 1842, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Johnson the sum of $756.82, being the amount received from the said Johnson upon a judgment against him in favor of the United States, together with the interest thereon from the time of such payment. (6 Stats. at Large, 856.)

"47. An act approved August 3, 1846, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Abraham Horbach the sum of $5,000, with lawful interest from the 1st of January, 1836, being the amount of a draft drawn by James Reeside on the Post-Office Department, dated April 18, 1835, payable on the 1st of January, 1836, and accepted by the treasurer of the Post-Office Department, which said draft was indorsed by said Abraham Horbach at the instance of the said Reeside, and the amount drawn from the Bank of Philadelphia, and, at maturity, said draft was protested for non-payment, and said Horbach became liable to pay, and, in consequence of his indorsement, did pay the full amount of said draft. (9 Stats. at Large, 677.)

"48. An act approved February 5, 1859, authorized the Secretary of War to pay to Thomas Laurent, as surviving partner, the sum of $15,000, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. yearly, from the 11th of November, 1847, it being the amount paid by the firm on that day to Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott, in the City of Mexico, for the purchase of a house in said city, out of the possession of which they were since ousted by the Mexican authorities. (11 Stats. at Large, 558.)

"49. An act approved March 2, 1847, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the balance due to the Bank of Metropolis for moneys due upon the settlement of the account of the bank with the United States, with interest thereon from the 6th day of March, 1838. (9 Stats. at Large, 689.)

"50. An act approved July 20, 1852, directed the payment to the legal representatives of James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia, the sum of $14,600, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 8th day of May, 1838, till paid, being the amount paid by him, under the sanction of the Indian agent, to certain Creek warriors, for slaves captured by said warriors while they were in the service of the United States against the Seminole Indians in Florida. (11 Stats. at Large, 734.)

"51. An act approved July 29, 1854, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John C. Frémont $183,825, with interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1851, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, in full for his account for beef delivered to Commissioner Barbour, for the use of the Indians in California, in 1851 and 1852. (10 Stats. at Large, 804.)

"52. An act approved July 8, 1870, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to make proper payments to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, bearing dated the fourth of June, 1867, in the case of the British brig Volant, and her cargo; and also another decree of the same court, bearing date the eleventh of June, in the same year, in the case of the British bark Science, and cargo, vessels illegally seized by a cruiser of the United States; such payments to be made as follows, namely: To the several persons named in such decrees, or their legal representatives, the several sums awarded to them respectively, with interest to each person from the date of the decree under which he receives payment. (16 Stats. at Large, 650.)

"53. An act approved July 8, 1870, directed the Secretary to make the proper payments to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, bearing date July 13, 1867, in the case of the British brig Dashing Wave, and her cargo, illegally seized by a cruiser of the United States, which decree was made in pursuance of the decision of the Supreme Court, such payments to be made with interest from the date of the decree. (16 Stats. at Large, 651.)

"An examination of these cases will show that, subsequent to the seizure of these several vessels, they were each sold by the United States marshal for the district of Louisiana as prize, and the proceeds of such sales deposited by him in the First National Bank of New Orleans. The bank, while the proceeds of these sales were on deposit there, became insolvent. The seizures were held illegal, and the vessels not subject to capture as prize. But the proceeds of the sales of these vessels and their cargoes could not be restored to the owners in accordance of the decrees of the district court, because the funds had been lost by the insolvency of the bank. In these cases, therefore, Congress provided indemnity for losses resulting from the acts of its agents, and made the indemnity complete by providing for the payment of interest.

"Your committee have directed attention to these numerous precedents for the purpose of exposing the utter want of foundation of the often-repeated assumption that 'the Government never pays interest.' It will readily be admitted that there is no statute law to sustain this position. The idea has grown up from the custom and usage of the accounting officers and Departments refusing to allow interest generally in their accounts with disbursing officers, and in the settlement of unliquidated domestic claims arising out of dealings with the Government. It will hardly be pretended, however, that this custom or usage is so 'reasonable,' well known, and 'certain,' as to give it the force and effect of law, and to override and trample under foot the law of nations and also the well-settled practice of the Government itself in its intercourse with other nations.

"Eleventh. Interest was allowed and paid to the State of Massachusetts because the United States delayed the payment of the principal for twenty-two years after the amount due had been ascertained and determined. The amount appropriated to pay this interest was $678,362.41, more than the original principal. (16 Stats. at Large, 198.)

"Mr. Sumner, in his report upon the memorial introduced for that purpose, discussing this question of interest, said:

"'It is urged that the payment of this interest would establish a bad precedent. If the claim is just, the precedent of paying it is one which our Government should wish to establish. Honesty and justice are not precedents of which either Government or individuals should be afraid.' (Senate Report 4, 41st Cong., 1st sess., page 10.)

"Twelfth. Interest has always been allowed to the several States for advances made to the United States for military purposes.

"The claims of the several States for advances during the Revolutionary war were adjusted and settled under the provision of the acts of Congress of August 5, 1790, and of May 31, 1794. By these acts interest was allowed to the States, whether they had advanced money on hand in their treasuries or obtained by loans.

"In respect to the advances of States during the war of 1812-'15, a more restricted rule was adopted, namely: That States should be allowed interest only so far as they had themselves paid it by borrowing, or had lost it by the sale of interest-bearing funds.

"Interest, according to this rule, has been paid to all the States which made advances during the war of 1812-'15 with the exception of Massachusetts. Here are the cases:

"Virginia, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 4, p. 161.
"Delaware, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 4, p. 175.
"New York, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 4, p. 192.
"Pennsylvania, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 4, p. 241.
"South Carolina, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 4, p. 499.

"In the Indian and other wars the same rule has been observed, as in the following cases:

"Alabama, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 9, page 344.
"Georgia, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 9, page 626.
"Washington Territory, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 11, page 429.
"New Hampshire, U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 10, page 1.

"Thirteenth. The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, in the report to which reference has heretofore been made, speaking of this award and of the obligation of the United States to pay interest upon the balance remaining due and unpaid thereon, used the following language:

"'Your committee are of the opinion that this sum should be paid them with accrued interest from the date of said award, deducting therefrom $250,000, paid to them in money, as directed by the act of March 2, 1861; and therefore find no sufficient reason for further delay in carrying into effect that provision of the aforenamed act and the act of March 3, 1871, by the delivery of the bonds therein described, with accrued interest from the date of the act of March 8, 1861.'

"Your committee have discussed this question with an anxious desire to come to such a conclusion in regard to it as would do no injustice to that Indian nation whose rights are involved here, nor establish such a precedent as would be inconsistent with the practice or duty of the United States in such cases. Therefore your committee have considered it not only by the light of those principles of the public law—always in harmony with the highest demands of the most perfect justice—but also in the light of those numerous precedents which this Government in its action in like cases has furnished for our guidance. Your committee can not believe that the payment of interest on the moneys awarded by the Senate to the Choctaw Nation would either violate any principle of law or establish any precedent which the United States would not wish to follow in any similar case, and your committee can not believe that the United States are prepared to repudiate these principles, or to admit that because their obligation is held by a weak and powerless Indian nation, it is any the less sacred or binding than if held by a nation able to enforce its payment and secure complete indemnity under it. Could the United States escape the payment of interest to Great Britain, if it should refuse or neglect, after the same became due, to pay the amount awarded in favor of British subjects by the recent joint commission which sat here? Could we delay payment of the amount awarded by that commission for fifteen years, and then escape by merely paying the principal? The Choctaw Nation asks the same measure of justice which we must accord to Great Britain; and your committee can not deny that demand unless they shall ignore and set aside those principles of the public law which it is of the utmost importance to the United States to always maintain inviolate.

"Your committee are not unmindful that the amount due the Choctaw Nation under the award of the Senate is large. They are not unmindful, either, that the discredit of refusing payment is increased in proportion to the amount withheld and the time during which such refusal has been continued."

Few, if any, of the foregoing cases presented as strong and meritorious grounds for the allowance of interest as the claim now under consideration. Following these precedents, and for the reasons above set forth, the committee deem the present a proper case for the payment of interest on the sum converted ($371,025) from date of conversion to date of payment. This interest they fix at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, that being about the average rate paid by the Government between 1867 and 1881, and which it may be fairly assumed was saved or made by it for the use of the funds during the period of detention. On this basis the interest allowed will amount to the sum of $249,039.95.

The committee accordingly recommend that the bill be amended as follows: in line 1 of section 2 strike out the words "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-nine," and in line second of said second section, after the word "thousand," insert the words "and thirty-nine and ninety-five hundredths;" and as thus amended that the bill be passed by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if this case was not once before the Committee on the Judiciary and reported adversely by that Committee?

Mr. HOAR. Never.

Mr. JACKSON. It was not, Mr. President. It never had been before Congress until it was referred to the Committee on Claims. There was a case, that of the First National Bank of Boston, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee last year or the year before, on the question of waiving the statute of limitations. That was the question involved, and the Committee on the Judiciary reported against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that I dissent from the views expressed in the report. I do not believe that interest ought to be paid in this case, and I regard it as an exceedingly dangerous precedent. I simply desire to say that I am opposed to the bill, and would vote against it on a yea-and-nay vote. I am paired, however, with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who is now absent upon this particular question, and can not vote.

Mr. CONGER. I see by an examination of the bill that this judgment became a valid judgment by the action of the Supreme Court of the United States October 25, 1881, and the judgment then was for $371,025. It will be presumed that whatever was due these parties at the time that judgment was finally rendered and confirmed by the dismissal of the appeal to the United States Supreme Court is contained in that amount. October 25, 1881, there came a judgment of $371,025. Four days after that $260,000 was paid out of the Treasury, and ten months after that $111,025, the balance of the judgment, was paid. Now, the committee recommend an appropriation of $249,039.95. Even allowing, which I do not admit for a moment, that interest should be paid in such a case as this, the committee recommend for the interest from the time the judgment became perfected, ten months, $249,039.95.

I have computed the interest which should be on the balance of the payment, not having computed it on the whole for four days, throwing that out because the $260,000 was paid when the claim was presented to the Treasury; and the interest, even if it could be allowed on the unpaid amount between the time it was due and the time it was paid, $111,025, would be $41,063.62, instead of the amount proposed here, over $249,000. By any rule of computation the interest could be only $41,063. Now, how can the $249,000 be possibly worked in here by any estimate of the liability of the Government? Here is a document containing probably an examination of the whole payments of the Treasury from the beginning of the Government until now, and giving every case in which interest has been allowed by the Government or by foreign governments. Peculiar cases!

This is a case where the party has not purged itself from complicity with the original fraud by the mere assertion of the committee that the cashier and principal owner of the bank did this and not the bank itself proper. There is nothing in the report to satisfy me but what not only the principal owner of the bank, who had great influence over the cashier, but the cashier himself and other members of the bank, assented to the temporary deposit of the bank securities with this defaulting officer for the purpose of defrauding and deceiving the United States. There is nothing in the testimony here to show that there was not complicity with more than the two persons mentioned. The presumption would be that no cashier and no officer of a bank dare, without consultation with the directors or managers, take the securities of a bank from the possession of the bank and go and give them to any other person whatever for any purpose whatever.

It was an open, patent fraud against the United States, committed by two officers of this bank, and there is nothing to show but that it was sanctioned by the others.

I think it was very well for the bank, after having shown these things, to trust to the equity, almost the mercy, of the Government to be repaid the value of the securities which it had so used. The Government paid back the full amount of the nominal face value of the securities which were thus transferred to this officer of the Government in fraud of the Government's rights as well as of the bank.

By any proper construction, if interest is demandable and payable against the Government of the United States, instead of $249,000 there would be but $41,063 due. I think this should have a more full discussion than we can have under the five-minute rule, and it seems to me that there is nothing peculiar in this case that should make the Government depart from the usual ordinary method of paying claims where the party seeking relief was in default and where some defaulting officer of the Government was in fault, paying back in full the face value of the securities taken. Whether they were worth that amount or not I do not know.

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Michigan and the Senate that every fact connected with this transaction has undergone judicial investigation in the highest courts of the land, and those courts have found that the bank did not connive at the fraud which was perpetrated upon it. They settled that as a question of fact ascertained and determined in those decisions, and the case is simply the case of a bank being robbed and of its stolen assets being placed in the hands of a defaulting officer of the Government for the use of the Government with the knowledge of the Government agent and appropriated by the Government agent to make good his own default, a large proportion of those assets being interest-bearing securities. It would be monstrous for the Government of the United States to withhold the payment of interest on this fund when it has thereby canceled obligations of its own that bore interest, and done that through the fraud of its own agent.

The interest allowed, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, is interest from the date of conversion to the date of payment. The Court of Claims was not authorized to allow interest, its jurisdiction upon the subject of interest being limited to cases where there was an express contract for the payment of interest; but the obligation of the Government goes beyond the mere question of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and the committee, after thorough investigation of this claim and of the numerous precedents before them in the legislation of Congress, thought that no stronger case could be presented for the allowance of interest.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. What proportion of the securities of this bank which were obtained by the subtreasurer at Boston were interest-bearing securities?

Mr. JACKSON. Forty-seven thousand dollars of them were interest-bearing securities, and at a higher rate than we allow.

Mr. HARRISON. Then only $47,000 out of $371,000 of the total debt was in interest-bearing securities.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. The balance was either cash or non-interest-bearing securities?

Mr. JACKSON. The balance was funds of the bank, checks on which it had to pay interest immediately after the breaking of the bank by this transaction. The Government got the benefit of the funds on which it stopped interest, the use of this money in paying its obligations, and subjected the bank at the same time to the loss of interest which it had to make good by its stockholders.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I understand the position of the Senator from Tennessee and of the committee is that the Government of the United States ought in all cases where it is indebted and unjustly postpones payment for any reason to pay interest. It seems to me it leads to that, because if the Government has collected an improper tax, as it once did I recollect in a case in which I was interested and retains that tax for ten years, the policy that the committee propose in this bill would make it an obligation on the Government in every such case when it made restitution of money which had been improperly exacted or obtained—and I think it should extend to the case of any debt where the payment of it was not promptly made for any reason—in all such cases the Government ought to adopt the policy of paying interest. Does it not involve that?

Mr. JACKSON. It does not, for the committee confined themselves to the special facts of this case. They did not undertake to lay down any general rule for the guidance of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senate will pardon me for making a little further answer to the Senator from Michigan. The foundation of this claim is not the fraudulent conduct of the bank's officer on the one side or of the agent of the United States on the other. When that fraud was discovered, after all the facts were known, the bank made a demand on the United States for its securities and funds, and the United States refused to return them. It is with that conversion made purposely by the authorities of the United States that this claim begins. It was a conversion to its own use. Now, the Supreme Court of the United States say over and over again that it is the policy of the United States to pay interest in such cases. It is not the policy of the United States to pay interest on taxes; it is not the policy of the United States to pay interest on mere debts, because it is presumed to be always ready to pay its debts, as all governments are; but it is the policy of the United States to repay with interest a citizen whose property it has seized and converted to its own use.

In June, 1872, it will be found by Senators on the sixth page of this report, Congress referred the claim of Francis Vigo to the Court of Claims with directions to be governed in the matter by the rules and regulations heretofore adopted by the United States in the settlement of like cases, and the Supreme Court of the United States say, affirming in that particular the judgment of the Court of Claims:

No rules and regulations have heretofore been adopted by the United States in the settlement of like cases except such as may be inferred from the policy of Congress when passing private acts for the relief of various persons. When passing such private acts Congress has allowed interest upon the claim up to the time that the relief was granted.

So we have here the express adjudication of the highest tribunal of the country that in such cases as this it is the policy of the Government to allow interest. The Senate will observe that the amount proposed in the bill has been cut down, and that for this period, when the current rate of interest in the country was 10 per cent., when the Government was paying first 8, then 7, then 5, then 4½, and only within a year or two 3½ and 3, we have allowed 4½ per cent. interest for the whole time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, of course under the rule I can speak but once. When I closed my remarks before I objected to the consideration of the bill under this rule. I think it demands more examination than I have been able to give to it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects to the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate take it up for consideration. The report has been read. The Senate never can examine it more fully nor my friend from Michigan than he can now. I ask him to allow it to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Michigan. The question is on that motion.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Michigan desires further time, as this is a matter of great importance, both in the amount involved and the principle involved, and it should be thoroughly understood by the Senate; there is no disposition to press it now. Perhaps the Senator will be content to let the bill go over until after the holidays, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. To be then taken up by the vote of the Senate allowing full debate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will then have an opportunity to make his objection. My request is that the bill shall remain on the Calendar under Rule VIII, that is the five-minute rule, as now, until after the 1st of January, and in the course of that time the Senator from Michigan can examine the bill. He will have his right of objection then as now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that this bill may retain its place on the Calendar and go over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BECK. I moved some time ago to proceed to the consideration of five or six pension bills that had passed the House of Representatives and been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Pensions without amendment. I hope now there will be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. Why not put it, "all House bills that have been reported favorably?"

Mr. BECK. There are only six or seven of the pension bills, beginning at Order of Business 942. I have gone over the Calendar carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all House pension bills which have been reported favorably and are now on the Calendar may be taken up for consideration in their order subject to objection.

Mr. WILSON. Does that include the Senate bills as well as House bills?

Mr. BECK. Only the House bills, so that a few of them may become laws before the holidays.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that the Senator include Senate bills favorably reported and unobjected to.

Mr. BECK. I thought we could pass the few bills that have come from the House and have them become laws before the holidays.

Mr. WILSON. I am not prepared to say that there are any Senate bills of that character on the Calendar, but there may be two or three, and in that case I suggest that favorable reports on Senate bills unobjected to may be considered.

Mr. BECK. After the few House bills are passed we can go over them, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that there are no Senate pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON. If there are no such Senate bills on the Calendar, of course I do not press my suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kentucky state precisely what he asks unanimous consent to?

Mr. BECK. To proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases that have passed the House of Representatives and been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House pension bills reported favorably, it being stated that there are no Senate pension bills. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON. I will not object after the statement made by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection where there are favorable reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Kentucky is for the consideration of House pension bills favorably reported, it being suggested that there are no favorable reports of Senate pension bills on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection. The first bill in order will be read.

Mr. BECK. Order of Business 942 is the first I can find.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds on the Calendar Order of Business 406, being the bill (S. 772) granting a pension to Erastus W. Babson, which was passed and a motion to reconsider entered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that in that case the beneficiary has died and therefore no action can be taken at present.

JACOB HOERTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 942, being House bill 3210, will be reported.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Jacob Hoerth. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Hoerth, late of Company C, Twenty-eighth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT BRANT.

The bill (H. R. 3382) granting a pension to Albert Brant was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after "pension-roll," to strike out "at $8 per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert Brant, late a private in Company A, Fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] who reported the bill is not here, the Senate will not insist on the amendment, because it sends the bill back to the House, and the case is a very urgent and needy one. The pension is but $8 a month, and the amendment would require this applicant to appear before the examining officer at some distance and pass an examination so as to fix the rate of pension. The pension fixed by the House bill is only $8 a month, and I trust this delay will not be required. It is a case I happen to know something about, and if the Senator from Pennsylvania were here he would not insist on the amendment; but he is not here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET DAILY.

The bill (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret Daily, widow of Thomas H. Daily, late captain of Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WILSON December 19, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily, has examined the same, and reports that an examination of the papers, records, and proofs submitted to the committee in support of the bill justifies a concurrence in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, made to that body, and which is here quoted, as follows, namely:

"That Margaret Daily is the widow of Thomas H. Daily, who enlisted as a private in Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on the 6th day of July, 1861, and served through all the intermediate grades to that of captain of said company, which position he held at the time of his honorable discharge from the military service of the United States, September 14, 1864.

"On the 3d day of September, 1881, the claimant filed her application for a pension, on the ground that the said Thomas H. Daily, while in the military service of the United States and in the line of his duty, contracted hemorrhoids, superinducing fistula in ano, resulting in his death, which occurred on the 3d day of May, 1881. This claim was rejected June 29, 1882, on the ground that the disease of which the soldier died was not contracted in the military service of the United States.

"The records of the Adjutant-General's Office show that Thomas H. Daily was mustered into the military service of the United States as second lieutenant Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, June 30, 1862; July and August he is reported present, and so borne to October 31, 1862; November 25, 1862, mustered as first lieutenant; February 28, 1863, as captain; December 31, 1862, detailed on General Jeff. C. Davis's staff, and so borne to April 30, 1863; May and June, 1863, present for duty; July and August, 1863, not on file; September and October, 1863, on detached service on General Davis's staff since July 2, 1863, and so borne to August 31, 1864.

"General Jeff. C. Davis, commanding First Division, Twentieth Army Corps, in accepting the resignation of Captain Daily, August 1, 1864, says:

"'This officer has won his promotion from the ranks, and has often distinguished himself in battle. He has served on my staff at different times with credit to himself. He seems now to have thoroughly made up his mind to resign from the service, and urges his resignation. His health has not been very good since the battle of Stone River.'

"Anthony R. Ravencraft, captain Company I, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, says:

"'That Capt. Thomas H. Daily, by exposure and fatigue at the battle of Chickamauga, brought on piles; visited him at General J. C. Davis's headquarters soon after the battle, and found him very much prostrated from the effects thereof. Captain Daily was then on General Davis's staff; met him frequently afterward; he had not recovered, and frequently complained of fistula.'

"Alex. M. Rutherford, private Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, corroborates the statement of Captain Ravencraft, and adds:

"'That said affection continued until said soldier was mustered out; subsequently resulting in fistula, from which he suffered until his death, May 3, 1881.'

"Dr. Samuel M. Work, of Hot Springs, Ark., says:

"'Capt. Thomas H. Daily came under his professional treatment in December, 1864; had a severe case of hemorrhoids, both internal and external, which continued until January, 1877; thinks fistula developed about 1867; that he never recovered from fistula in ano.'

"Dr. Will. F. Works, of Jeffersonville, Ind., treated Captain Daily for said affections from April, 1877, to 1879.

"Dr. James E. Oldham, of Charlestown, Ind., was Captain Daily's family physician from January, 1879, to the time of his death, May 3, 1881. He says:

"'That in January, 1879, soldier applied to him to treat him for hemorrhoids and fistula in ano, but his general health was so bad that he did not deem it advisable to recommend any but palliatives and tonics for his general condition; that about November 25, 1879, there were well-defined evidences of cerebro-spinal softening, which continued until and was the immediate cause of his death; that it is his (affiant's) opinion that hemorrhoids and fistula in ano, by their depreciating effects upon the vital force, acted as prime causes in the production of the cerebro-spinal troubles of which he died.'

"Your committee find from the evidence as given above that the disease contracted by this soldier in the distinguished military service rendered resulted in his death, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

Your committee, approving this statement of the case, reports the bill to the Senate, and recommends its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY ALDEN.

The bill (H. R. 4094) granting a pension to Henry Alden was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Henry Alden, late a private in Company E, Eighteenth Massachusetts Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USEBUS SWEET.

The bill (H. R. 2440) granting a pension to Usebus Sweet was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Usebus Sweet, late of Company G, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES F. PARIS.

The bill (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Charles F. Paris, late a private in Company F, One hundred and twenty-third Indiana Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK CORFE.

The bill (H. R. 452) granting a pension to Frederick Corfe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Frederick Corfe, late an acting staff surgeon in the United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF OMAHA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I crave the indulgence of the Senate and ask the immediate consideration of Order of Business 939 on the Calendar under the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 939, the title of which will be read.

The Secretary read the title of the bill (S. 2269) to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Omaha.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to move to take up Order of Business 489, being the bill (S. 654) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic. This is merely the ordinary bill which we have passed four separate times in the Senate, introduced always by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and reported favorably by the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 654.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill is brief. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.. It will be read for information.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the bill is read I wish to state that it has passed the Senate four times——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask permission to state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to be allowed to make some remarks on this bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I will make my remarks after the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of seven persons, not more than four of whom shall belong to the same political party nor be advocates of prohibition, who shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and who shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed two years. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also to inquire as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States of the Union.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary; that the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, not exceeding $10,000, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and for this purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, with such suggestions and recommendations as they may see fit to make, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, within eighteen months after the passage of this act, to be transmitted by him to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not make any remarks, but submit the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that this bill be now considered.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. PUGH (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCPHERSON (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL]. I do not know how he would vote on this subject, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FAIR. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Nevada]. I shall not vote.

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. COKE. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore will not vote. I would vote "nay" if at liberty.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] on all questions about which he supposes they would differ. The Chair does not know what the views of the Senator from Arkansas are on this question.

Mr. WALKER. I think my colleague [Mr. GARLAND], if present, would vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair would on that account withhold his vote, being in favor of the bill, but he asks to be called again and votes "nay," in order that the business of the Senate may not be interrupted.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (after having voted in the affirmative). I have voted on this question, but I am paired generally with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] who is not present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Vote "nay" the same as he would vote.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Let my vote stand under the circumstances.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sheffield,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Lapham,	Platt,	Wilson.
Frye,	Logan,	Plumb,

NAYS—16.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Slater,
Butler,	Edmunds,	Jonas,	Vest,
Call,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Walker.

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Beck,	Garland,	Lamar,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	George,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Brown,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Groome,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Coke,	Hill,	Maxey,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Williams.
Dawes,	Jackson,	Palmer,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. BLAIR. It has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was only read for information, and as it is a bill of some importance it had better be read.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I suppose it is not read for information now?

The bill was read.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the report of the committee be read; it is quite full.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR April 15, 1884.

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 654) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, have considered the same, and recommend its passage.

This bill has been presented in many Congresses and repeatedly passed in the Senate, but has thus far failed to become a law. Its passage has been strongly urged hitherto, and is still demanded by a great multitude of the wisest and most patriotic citizens of the country. Its leading purpose is to secure a thorough and authoritative investigation, that the truth may become known and authentically, accurately, and reliably stated in regard to the existence, the nature, and the extent of the evils of the traffic in alcoholic liquors. In the great controversy now pending, and which seems to grow more and more serious and to press more and more for solution between the advocates of diverse policies and measures in regard to this traffic, it is a matter of the first importance for all parties to ascertain the facts.

It is with this view, and for no other purpose, that your committee, entertaining, as they do, diverse opinions personally upon the questions involved in the general subject of so-called temperance legislation, unite in recommending the passage of this bill for the creation of a commission for thorough and impartial inquiry into the facts.

We annex the reporter's notes of the statements of advocates of the bill made before the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have the bill read again; I did not catch what the bill was. Let the title at least be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be again read.

The title was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he ask for the yeas and nays on the question of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought that was exactly what I was doing.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The question now is on the third reading.

Mr. VEST. This will do just as well.

Mr. BUTLER. It is practically the same thing.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say a word before the vote is taken. I have not the slightest disposition to oppose any examination in regard to existing facts or the evils that arise from the excessive use of alcoholic beverages; but I object to this mode of arriving at legislation. In my judgment it is a matter for the States and not for the National Government. I know the answer will be that this is simply preliminary and does not involve the question of the powers of the States or the rights of the States; but it is a step in that direction. There is no proof, no evidence that the States are not entirely competent under the Constitution to attend to this matter. And as the legislation, in my judgment, must come from the States I think the information should be had by them on their own motion.

I do not choose to be put in the attitude of advocating intemperance, and I do not choose to be placed in the category of opposing temperance, but I do not believe in the Federal Government either by investigation or otherwise invading what I suppose to be the constitutional province of the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that by unanimous consent—I understand that was the desire of the Senator from South Carolina—the yeas and nays be taken on the passage of the bill and the order just made be regarded as reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of this bill be reconsidered and that they stand as being ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass? on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay;" but not knowing how he would vote, I decline to answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. EDMUNDS's name was called). On this question the Senator from Vermont is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND]. If the latter Senator were present, the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if there be any Senator paired with my colleague [Mr. DAWES] on this question? I believe there is none. And if not, I should like to have the pair of the Senator from Vermont with the Senator from Arkansas transferred to my colleague.

Mr. HARRIS. Some gentleman announced this morning a pair of the Senator's colleague.

Mr. HOAR. That was on one particular bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on one bill only. I found that it did not extend to anything else. I vote "nay" on this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Vermont will transfer his pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to announce the pair between my colleague [Mr. PIKE] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Sheffield,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Harrison,	Morrill,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Platt,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Sawyer,

NAYS—16.

Bayard,	Gibson,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Beck,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Pugh,	Walker.

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Bowen,	Garland,	Logan,	Ransom,
Brown,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Camden,	Hill,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Sewell,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Palmer,	Vance,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Fair,	Kenna,	Pike,

So the bill was passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to report back at this time with amendments the bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service, that it may be laid on the table and printed, and I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to present at this time a report from the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Maine reports with amendments the bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service.

Mr. HALE. I will simply say that the committee now report as a substitute for the House bill sent over to us for thirty-one days the regular appropriation bill for the remainder of the fiscal year from January 1 to June 30, 1885, precisely as the House of Representatives sent that bill to us at the last session. The cruisers are stricken out, the ironclads are stricken out, the legislation that was put on by the Senate is stricken off, and the substitute stands, so far as amounts go, precisely on the basis that the House made up the appropriation bill originally for the present year. In that the Senate maintains its attitude of considering this year's appropriations, and not voting upon the rule of last year.

Mr. MORRILL. Do you provide for one month or six months?

Mr. HALE. For six months, making the bill complete for the year. I will call it up, and, if necessary, make further explanations to-morrow.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. MAXEY were, on their own motion, granted leave of absence until January 2, 1885.

Mr. LAPHAM was, on his own motion, granted leave of absence until January 5, 1885.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 23, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial of the American Association for the Advancement of Sciences, together with a resolution on the subject of extending the operations of the Coast and Geodetic Survey through all the States of the United States. The memorial and paper will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONAS presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of a joint committee of the commercial exchanges of New Orleans, La., composed of the Cotton Exchange, Sugar Exchange, Produce Exchange, and Mexican, Central American, and South American Exchange, signed by their respective chairmen, protesting against the ratification of the proposed treaty with Spain, for the reason that it would be ruinous in its effect upon the commercial and agricultural interests of Louisiana and the Southwest; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2031) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2489) for the relief of Mrs. Moivere Tousey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD REPORTS.

Mr. VEST submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their authors for correction they shall be returned to the reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and if not so returned they shall then be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the original notes of the reporter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the present consideration of the resolution or its reference?

Mr. VEST. I wish to say a few words about it before it is referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senate will now consider the resolution subject to objection.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, of all the abuses which have grown up in public affairs, none is more glaring than that connected with the printed reports of Congressional debates.

In a country where public opinion controls the conduct of the Government, and those who make the laws are responsible directly to their constituents, it is manifestly of the greatest importance that correct and full reports of the proceedings and debates of Congress should be had, not only for the information of those who have elected the existing Congress, but for transmitting to those who come after a reliable history of the causes and motives for legislation found upon the statute-books. It is absolutely required, in justice to the representative and his constituency, and in obedience to the demand for a truthful history of political events, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should become, what it purports to be, an account of what is said and done in Congress, and not the garbled and fraudulent thing it really is, filled with orations which were never delivered and turgid eloquence never heard.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should truthfully represent the thoughts and action of those who are transacting the public business of 55,000,000 earnest, intelligent, hopeful people, who are working out not only for this continent and age, but for all ages, the problem of free government. Making the laws, influencing the opinions, and shaping the destiny of such a people should be considered the highest duty ever committed to human hands, and the record of the manner in which this duty is discharged should contain the truth.

Good faith between the people and their servants, public morality and decency demand that the abuses now existing should be remedied. What can be more ruinous to the cause of truth than the daily printing of debates which have no existence? What can be more demoralizing and disheartening to the young and honest reader of the RECORD than the discovery that the Representative whom he has been taught to admire as an examplar of all public virtues is a public cheat and fraud? That he is holding himself out to those at a distance from the capital as a parliamentary orator, and franking by the thousand "Remarks of the Hon. Bardwell Slote, delivered in the House of Representatives on June 25, 1884?"; when in fact the Hon. Bardwell Slote had made no such remarks, but was probably at the identical time when he was supposed to be electrifying the floor and galleries, greeted with rounds of applause, and the recipient of numberless bouquets, munching his frugal lunch in the House restaurant or snoring placidly in a cloak-room.

The people of the United States are the best natured and most forgiving upon the face of the earth, for in no other country would such outrages be tolerated as have for years been perpetrated upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by aspiring orators and statesmen. Some of them are so ludicrous as to appeal successfully to the national sense of humor, and the American public have generally come to regard the proceedings of Congress as a sort of variety performance, where nothing is supposed to be real except the pay.

Mr. President, I am not the first to attack this abuse. On February 11, 1876, our late colleague, Governor Anthony, offered in the Senate the resolution which I now submit.

In the course of an admirable speech supporting the resolution Governor Anthony alluded to an instance within his own term of service where a member of the House obtained leave to print some remarks on the annexation of Cuba, and when the speech appeared in the Globe it proved to be a most violent personal assault upon Mr. Sumner, then a member of the Senate. As Governor Anthony proceeds to say, the most ludicrous and disgraceful illustration of the practice obtaining under the rule permitting the publication in the Globe of speeches never delivered is found in Part 4, Appendix to the Globe for the Thirty-seventh Congress. The same speech was delivered by two gentlemen, one on the 24th of April in "Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union," and the other on May 26 in the House, on the "bill to confiscate the property and free the slaves of rebels." Malicious persons have intimated that this wonderful identity of thought and diction came from the fact that an enterprising member of the "literary lobby" sold the same speech to two ambitious statesmen without either knowing of the purchase by his colleague; but those of us who have watched the operation of great intellects and the singular unanimity with which they arrive at the same conclusions, especially after a party caucus, will discard the slanderous imputation.

Whatever may have been the cause of the identity to which I have alluded, the RECORD shows that each gentleman asked and obtained leave to print, their incubation having the same result.

Another disgraceful abuse of the printing rule is found in the RECORD of April 13, 1880, where a member of poetic tendencies obtained leave to print his remarks on a "bill providing for certain paintings on the walls of the Capitol," and then inserted in the RECORD blank verse to the amount of sixty pages quarto, with this appropriate caption, "To the Immortals."

On December 14, 1882, we find in the RECORD, while the House was in Committee of the Whole on the "bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884," a very few remarks by a distinguished member of the House, supplemented by the entire Constitution of the United States; and this publication in face of the fact that the Constitution can be found in the volumes containing the Revised Statutes, the Rules of both the Senate and House, and the hundreds of publications on constitutional law and United States history.

It is hardly to be supposed that this sacred instrument would appear at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD except under leave to print.

The most remarkable act of disinterested publication is found, however, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 6, 1884.

The RECORD shows the following:

On the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. ——— said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I said all that I wish to say on the tariff in my speech in the Forty-seventh Congress, and I could only reiterate the same. But since that time an article has been written upon the tariff which in my judgment surpasses all others for clearness of statement and conclusiveness of argument that have ever been written on that subject. It comes from the pen of the magnetic statesman James G. Blaine, who I hope may be chosen as the standard bearer of the principles he so ably represents.

In his Twenty Years of Congress, volume 1, pages 178-214, he says.

This brief address is then supplemented by the chapters on the tariff of the Hon. J. G. Blaine's recently published work, and the Congressional campaign committee of the Republican party advertised this original oration in the late canvass at the moderate price of $10 per thousand, sent under frank as part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to any part of the country.

In other words, leave to print his remarks is obtained by a member of the House, and a campaign document is then inserted in the RECORD, the cost of printing to be paid for out of the common Treasury of the people, and the cost of transportation in the mails to be covered by a Congressional frank! At the last session leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD was given to a Representative who had spoken for six minutes, and after the adjournment of Congress an elaborate speech appeared in the printed debates, reflecting seriously upon committees of both the Senate and House and upon another Representative. In the course of debate some days since, upon a motion to expunge this speech from the RECORD, a communication was read from the Public Printer showing that in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses five hundred and sixty-nine speeches were printed in the RECORD, not one word of which was delivered in the House, and eleven hundred and eighty-three were withheld for revision, and so altered and amended as to be beyond all recognition by those who heard the original addresses.

Mr. President, if time permitted I could multiply almost indefinitely instances of flagrant outrage perpetrated under the practice of printing in the RECORD speeches never delivered. It has often happened that assertions the most monstrous and assaults the most outrageous have been discovered for the first time in the RECORD after the adjournment of Congress and when the debate had been distributed over the country. Every public man knows how useless it is then to attempt refutation or explanation. At the last session the provisions of the resolution I offer were placed upon the legislative appropriation bill by the Senate, but stricken out in the House, and upon conference the amendment was abandoned. It was argued then, conspicuously by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that the House of Representatives should have the right to control the record of its own proceedings, and regulate as it pleased the publication of its own debates.

If the House were an independent body, legislating alone and not in conjunction with the Senate; if its debates were not printed under an act of Congress and paid for out of the common Treasury, there would be some force in this position. But the debates are those of Congress, published under the provisions of law, and it is our duty so far as we are able to see that the abuse of publishing pretended and not real debates should be abolished. The law requires the publication of the debates in Congress, not in one House alone, but in both, and it is impossible to discriminate between our duty to attempt by proper legislation to prevent a pernicious violation of law in this as in every other such instance.

There is but one method by which to prevent the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from being made the vehicle for injustice and personal or party malevolence. Let the disgraceful and fraudulent practice of publishing as uttered what has never been heard in debate be at once and forever prohibited, and let the anomaly of a silent orator be no longer known in the American Congress.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read. While I enjoyed the remarks of the Senator, for the life of me I could not tell what he was talking about.

Mr. VEST. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to correct what seemed to be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Missouri. He referred to a speech which was substantially the chapters of Mr. Blaine's book upon the tariff as having been printed at Government expense and then sold by committees at 10 cents a hundred, or whatever the price may have been. Now, any copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of speeches that are in the RECORD, beyond the regular edition of the RECORD, are paid for at the Government Printing Office by whatever committee orders them, Republican or Democratic, before they are distributed, or before they are sold to anybody. If sold, they are sold to local committees, who simply repay the national committee. I venture to say that is the case with the committees of both parties; so that it can not be said that the printing was done at Government expense and then the pamphlet sold afterward by private persons or volunteer committees.

Mr. VEST. I only spoke of what has been stated currently in the press. Of course I have no personal knowledge, but I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if it is not true that this paper, purporting to be a portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, was franked and sent all over the country?

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes; anything that is a part of the RECORD; anything that is part of a Government print—that is, a reprint or part of the original Government edition—can be franked. That is the well-understood law. But I wanted to correct the Senator's misapprehension in this, that if any copies were sold they were first paid for to the Government and then afterward transferred at the same cost. I have no doubt that is true of both political committees.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another statement should be made in aid of the position taken by the Senator from Missouri. The chief expense caused by this extra printing is undoubtedly in composition. The Government of the United States prints a great number of copies of the RECORD for public distribution by members of Congress, and all the extra cost of composition and printing this large number, together with the cost of binding, makes it a very expensive document, probably the most expensive printed by the Government except the explorations and surveys—makes that additional cost of public printing, so that the public RECORD now is reaching six, seven, or eight volumes for one session of Congress. When I first entered Congress one volume for the short session and two volumes for the long session was the rule as to the size of the Globe. Now it has got to be seven or eight volumes, and all of it grows out of this abuse, which, in my judgment, ought to be corrected. In this matter the Senate is somewhat to blame. We ought not to complain of others while we violate the rules ourselves. We print a great deal more in the Senate than we formerly did. Every day almost there is printing ordered by the Senate, generally good-naturedly, because no one likes to object, which by the rules can not be printed except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. No speeches of Senators are printed in the RECORD unless they are actually delivered here. There is no "leave to print" in the Senate, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. But almost every day printing is ordered by unanimous consent. Without making any invidious distinction, I will state that the other day a member of the Senate rose and said that instead of reading them he would ask to have certain documents printed. It is done every day here. I have seen it done many a time.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not a speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; but parts of a speech—exhibits, and memorials, which are longer than a speech; and sometimes when memorials are offered by Senators they are printed in the RECORD, so that we are gradually falling into the same habit.

In my judgment it would be a great deal better to reduce the RECORD below even what it was twenty years ago, and make it like what in England are called the Hansard Debates, a compendium of the debates. Such a publication would be immensely more valuable because immensely more convenient. If the resolution of the Senator from Missouri could bring about a reform of that kind it would reduce the size of our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to one volume in the short session and two volumes in the long session. If we could have a prohibition of all matter that is not delivered, and some mode of condensing, I think it would be of great advantage, but it would be a very difficult operation.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senator from Ohio is quite right. It is desirable if possible to condense the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but what I alluded to was the different practice which prevails in the Senate and House as I understand it. Now, in the Senate it is supposed that if the rule is followed nothing goes into the RECORD except what is actually delivered here orally by Senators. In the House, as I understand, a leave to print is obtained, so that speeches which are never in fact delivered in the House are printed in the RECORD. Nothing of that sort occurs here.

Then I understand another practice prevails in the House, which is for a member, who is limited to perhaps five or ten minutes, to commence the delivery of a speech which he has already prepared, and not having time to conclude it, to obtain leave to print the remainder of his remarks. Nothing of the kind is done in the Senate. That is what I alluded to when I interrupted the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FRYE. There is one thing that might be said in excuse for the other branch. Under the rules of the House it is very seldom that there occurs a discussion where any member is allowed over ten minutes in debate. The most valuable discussions that are had in the other branch are under the five-minute rule, and under no rule of the House can any member be entitled to over one hour, that is, a member having in charge a matter of importance or the committee having it in charge, while in the Senate a Senator may rise in his place and give notice and at any time in the future may stop the whole business of the Senate, surround himself with books five feet high and read from one hour to two hours or four or six or ten hours, I judge, or any length of time that he pleases. There is no limitation upon debate in the Senate. Any Senator gets time when he pleases, and any Senator occupies all the time that he pleases. This may be to a certain extent an excuse for the House of Representatives.

It seems to me that the most serious difficulty about this whole matter is not the expense of printing, it is not the number of volumes which are printed, but is the suggestion which the Senator from Missouri just made, that a speech appears in the RECORD as if made in the Committee of the Whole House or as if made in the House, and whoever reads that RECORD away from here, not understanding the customs of the House, has reason to suppose that that speech is made when all the members of the House are present; and statements are made, assertions are indulged in, attacks occur where the member attacked or assailed must have been expected to have made answer, and yet no answer is made, because he knows absolutely nothing about it. I remember very distinctly one day reading in the RECORD a speech which was made about the manufacturers of New England, and charges were made that the operatives in those mills were slaves, that they were almost starved to death, that they were treated more inhumanly than the slaves of the South ever were treated. A constituent of mine called my attention for the first time to it and wanted to know if I was not present attending to my duty and why I had permitted a thing of that kind to go unchallenged. Well, it was one Saturday when nobody was there except the Speaker of the House of Representatives and six other members, each one of whom had a long speech to deliver, and each one of whom, perhaps, read five or ten minutes and then printed about a two hours' speech. That seems to me the most serious difficulty about the matter.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I embrace this opportunity to correct an impression which is quite prevalent, that a member of Congress can have any amount of printing done at the public expense. The fact is well known here that but a limited number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is distributed, and if a member of Congress desires more he must pay for his copies, and if he desires to have a speech printed he must pay the cost to the Government and 10 per cent. added. There is nothing which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that can be obtained for gratuitous distribution or at all unless it is paid for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the concurrent resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 2280) for the relief of Mrs. Jane Venable.

CHEROKEE LANDS WEST OF ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas by the act of March 3, 1883, the sum of $300,000 was appropriated by Congress for the benefit of the Cherokee Nation of Indians "out of the funds due under appraisement for Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate as soon as practicable—

First. What was the price paid said Cherokee Nation per acre for their lands west of Arkansas River.

Second. Whether there has been more than one appraisement of such lands; and, if so, what, and by what authority.

Third. If the payment of said $300,000 was on account of any lands belonging to said Cherokee Nation west of the Arkansas River other than the lands occupied by the Pawnees, Nez Percés, Poncas, Ottoes, Missourias, and Osages.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be now read for amendment, thereby saving a reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). If there be no objection it will be so read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out—

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the last half of the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes:

For the pay of the Navy, for the active-list, namely: For one Admiral, one Vice-Admiral, eight rear-admirals, seven chiefs of bureaus, twenty-one commodores, forty-five captains, eighty-seven commanders, seventy-eight lieutenant-commanders, two hundred and seventy-two lieutenants, ninety-five junior lieutenants, ninety-five ensigns, ninety-eight junior ensigns, fourteen medical directors, fifteen medical inspectors, fifty surgeons, seventy-nine passed assistant surgeons, eight assistant surgeons, two assistant surgeons not in line of promotion (who shall hereafter, after fifteen years' service, be entitled to receive, as annual pay, when at sea, $2,100, when on shore duty $1,800, and when on leave or waiting orders $1,600) thirteen pay-directors, twelve pay-inspectors, forty-nine paymasters, twenty-nine passed assistant paymasters, twenty assistant paymasters, sixty-nine chief engineers, ninety-three passed assistant engineers, seventy-eight assistant engineers, twenty-four chaplains, eleven professors of mathematics, ten naval constructors, nine assistant naval constructors, ten civil engineers, one hundred and eighty-eight warrant officers, thirty-eight mates, two hundred and ninety-five naval cadets; in all, $1,743,750.

For pay of the retired-list, namely: For forty-three rear-admirals, twenty commodores, eleven captains, twelve commanders, sixteen lieutenant-commanders, twenty-seven lieutenants, seven ensigns, twenty-two medical directors, two medical inspectors, four surgeons, five passed assistant surgeons, seven assistant surgeons, nine pay-directors, two pay-inspectors, four paymasters, two passed assistant paymasters, one assistant paymaster, eleven chief engineers, twenty passed assistant engineers, twenty-six assistant engineers, eight chaplains, six professors of mathematics, one chief constructor, three civil engineers, thirteen boatswains, ten gunners, nine carpenters, and seven sailmakers; in all, $361,865.

For pay to petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineers' force and for the Coast Survey service, not exceeding 8,250; in all, $1,245,000.

For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to paymasters, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest, transportation of funds, exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, which shall specify the special necessity for such travel, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets, and for the payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1885, in excess of the numbers of each class provided for in this act, and for any increase of pay arising from different duty, as the needs of the service may require; for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices at the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library; mail and express wagons, and livery and express fees; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress, and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, cost of special instruction, and information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof, $182,500.

For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices, at Washington, D. C., $7,500.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

For foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in correcting compasses on board ship, and for adjusting and testing compasses on shore; nautical and astronomical instruments, nautical books, maps, charts, and sailing directions, and repairs of nautical instruments for ships of war; books for libraries of ships of war; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signal-lights, lanterns, rockets, running-lights, drawings, and engravings for signal-books; compass-fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ships' ways, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages, for general use on board ship, including those for the cabin, ward-room, and steerage, for the holds and spirit-room, for decks and quartermasters' use; bunting and other materials for flags, and making and repairing flags of all kinds; oil for ships of war, other than that used in the engineer department; candles when used as a substitute for oil in binnacles and running-lights; chimneys and wicks, and soap used in the navigation department; stationery for commanders and navigators of vessels of war and for use of courts-martial; musical instruments and music for vessels of war; steering-signals and indicators, and speaking-tubes and gongs for signal communication on board vessels of war; and for introducing electric lights on board vessels of war, not exceeding $2,500; in all, $25,000.

For erection of compass-testing house, $7,000.

For contingent expenses of the Bureau of Navigation, namely: For freight and transportation of navigation materials, postage and telegraphing on public business, advertising for proposals, packing-boxes and materials, and all other contingent expenses, $1,000.

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $2,500.

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

For procuring, producing, and preserving ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, tools, materials, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at magazines, at the ordnance dock, New York, and at the naval experimental battery, $25,000.

For necessary repairs to ordnance buildings, magazines, gun-parks, boats, lighters, wharves, machinery, and other objects of the like character, $7,500.

For miscellaneous items, namely: For freight to foreign and home stations, advertising and auctioneers' fees, cartage and express charges, repairs to fire-engines, gas and water pipes, gas and water tax at magazines, toll, ferriage, foreign passage, and telegrams to and from the bureau, $1,500.

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $2,500.

For the torpedo corps, namely: For labor, material, freight and express charges; general repairs to grounds, buildings, and wharves; boats; instruction; instruments, tools, furniture, experiments, and general torpedo outfits, $25,000.

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING.

For equipment of vessels: For coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling; hemp, wire, hides, and other materials for the manufacture of rope and cordage; iron for the manufacture of anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, bags, and hammocks; heating apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards, $298,000.

For expenses of recruiting: For expenses of recruiting for the naval service, rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same, advertising for men and boys, and all other expenses attending the recruiting for the naval service, and for the transportation of enlisted men and boys at home and aboad, $12,500.

For contingent expenses equipment and recruiting: For extra expenses of training-ships, freight and transportation of equipment stores, printing, advertising, telegraphing, books and models, postage, car-tickets, ferriage, ice, apprehension of deserters and stragglers, assistance to vessels in distress, continuous service certificates and good-conduct badges for enlisted men, school-books for training-ships, medals for boys, and emergencies arising under cognizance of Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting unforeseen and impossible to classify, $5,000.

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $4,500.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely: For freights and transportation of materials and stores; books, models, maps, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire-engines; machinery; repairs on steam fire-engines, and attendance on the same; purchase and maintenance of oxen and horses, and driving teams, carts, and timber-wheels, and all vehicles for use in the navy-yards, and tools and repairs of the same; dredging; postage on letters and other mailable matter on public service; telegrams; furniture for Government houses and offices in the navy-yards; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of public buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire-engines, and apparatus; for clerical and incidental labor at navy-yards; water-tax, and for toll and ferriages; rent of four officers' quarters at League Island; pay of the watchmen in the navy-yards; and for awning and packing-boxes, and advertising for yard and dock purposes, $86,000.

For contingent expenses that may arise at navy-yards and stations, $5,000.

For the civil establishment at navy-yards and stations, $12,000.

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

For support of the medical department: For surgeon's necessaries for vessels in commission, navy-yards, naval stations, Marine Corps, and Coast Survey, and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy-yards, naval laboratory, and Naval Academy, $30,000.

For the naval-hospital fund, namely: For maintenance of the naval hospitals at the various navy-yards and stations, $15,000. And if the Secretary of the Navy shall not be able to maintain properly the whole number of naval hospitals now kept open on the amounts hereby appropriated for the maintenance of and civil establishment at naval hospitals, he shall close those which are least necessary to the service, and provide for the patients now cared for therein at such other naval hospitals as may be most convenient.

For contingent expenses of the bureau: For freight on medical stores; transportation of insane patients; advertising; telegraphing; purchase of books; expenses attending the medical board of examiners; rent of rooms for naval dispensary; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; purchase and repair of wagons and harness; purchase and feed of horses and cows; trees, garden tools, and seeds, $12,500.

SEC. 2. That all appropriations made by the act of July 7, 1884, making temporary provision for the naval service for the six months ending December 31, 1884, or any balances thereof that may be unexpended at that date, be, and they are hereby, reappropriated, continued, and made available for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to report to Congress, at its next and each regular session thereafter, the amount expended during the prior fiscal year, from the appropriations for the pay of the Navy, Bureaus of Navigations, Ordnance, Equipment and Recruiting, Yards and Docks, Medicine and Surgery, Provisions and Clothing, Construction and Repair, and Steam-Engineering, for civilians employed on clerical duty, or in any other capacity than as ordinary mechanics and workingmen, and to submit, under the estimates for pay of the Navy and for the respective Bureaus enumerated above, specific estimates for such civilian employés for the fiscal year 1886, and each fiscal year thereafter.

Mr. HALE. The basis of the amendment is the regular appropriation bill for the present year ending July 1, 1885, made up on the estimates of that year, as matured by the House and sent to the Senate. So far as the amounts go they are precisely the same as the House bill; so that we tender to them the bill as matured by them, taking their work.

The only exceptions are some small items, one of a thousand dollars for commutation of quarters for officers of the Marine Corps by the act of July 7, 1884; another for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, $5,000; and a third for the civil establishment, Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, $6,000; in all $12,000. Those are made necessary by the fact that without them nothing would be had in these several branches for the succeeding six months. Otherwise the amendment is the regular bill as it passed the House.

There have been one or two matters of change of law that the bill leaves off for the conference to adjust, and there are one or two places to which I call attention now, where I wish to make amendments to conform to existing law.

First, in line 13 the amendment provides for "ninety-five ensigns and ninety-eight junior ensigns." Since the bill was matured by the House a law has been passed, the act of June 26, 1884, by which they are all made ensigns and the rank of junior ensign is abolished. Therefore, in line 13, before the word "ensigns," I move to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred and ninety-three," and after the word "ensigns" to strike out "ninety-eight junior ensigns;" so as to read, "one hundred and ninety-three ensigns," to conform to existing law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 229, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "twelve" and insert "two;" so as to read:

For necessary repairs of naval laboratory, &c., $2,500.

That is a mistake in the print.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 287, before the words "per cent.," I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied to the repair of engines and machinery of wooden ships where the estimated cost of such repair shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost of new engines and machinery of the same character and power.

That is to conform to existing law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I believe that is all except the amendment to the title, which will come up after the bill has passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes."

TAXATION OF RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first case on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be stated.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before the Senate proceeds to the Calendar I should like to move that Order of Business 113 under Rule IX, being the bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, be made the special order for Friday, the 9th day of January.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the bill named by him be made a special order for Friday, the 9th of January next, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GARLAND. With the permission of the Senate, I desire to state that that is a very important bill, and several Senators, who I see are absent now from their places, are very much interested in it. If the Senator from Nebraska thinks the time named by him will be sufficient to allow the return of those Senators, I am perfectly satisfied myself.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that it can be made a special order for that day, with the understanding that if any Senator who is interested is away, it shall be made a special order for another day.

Mr. GARLAND. It is perfectly agreeable to me with that understanding. There are several Senators who I know are very much interested in this bill, who I know are absent from the city. With that understanding, however, I have no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 761, being the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the bill named by him be now considered by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the House resolution relating to adjournment now on the table may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 16, 1884.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January, 1885.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senate is now in such a situation with regard to the public business as to be able to take up that resolution for consideration. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I move now to strike out "Saturday," before "December," and insert "Wednesday;" and after "December," to strike out "20th" and insert "24th;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, December 24, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January, 1885.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move now that we resume the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 24, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a memorial of the cigar-makers' union of Elyria, Ohio, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 237) for the relief of Frances W. Dyer; and

A bill (S. 1863) for the relief of Robert C. Murphy.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 384) for the relief of William M. Pleas and F. S. Jones, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 678) in relation to the Chinese indemnity fund, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, moved their indefinite postponement; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 1271) in relation to the Chinese indemnity fund; and,

A bill (S. 1961) supplementary to an act approved June 19, 1878, giving to the Court of Claims jurisdiction of the Caldera claims upon the Chinese indemnity fund.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for a holiday recess.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, adjourned until Monday, January 5, 1885.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 24, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments bills of the House of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 452) granting a pension to Frederick Corfe;

A bill (H. R. 2440) granting a pension to Usebus Sweet;

A bill (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris;

A bill (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Jacob Hoerth;

A bill (H. R. 3382) granting a pension to Albert Brant;

A bill (H. R. 4094) granting a pension to Henry Alden; and

A bill (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, bills and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service; and Concurrent resolution providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 5, 1885.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 654) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic;

A bill (S. 1543) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele; and

A bill (S. 2269) to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw certain papers from one of the committees of the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that it will be necessary to submit a request in writing. The Chair thinks, perhaps, however, that it is not the intention of the House to transact any business to-day except mere formal business.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now to take up for present consideration the House resolution providing for the usual holiday recess as amended by the Senate.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. REED. Before that is done I desire to make a correction of the RECORD.

On page 427 of the RECORD of the proceedings of Saturday last, under the heading "Interstate commerce," the Speaker has directed in the regular edition a correction of the following six lines, coming immediately after the second line under this title:

Mr. REAGAN. I move the previous question on the pending section and amendment.
Mr. REED. Is that motion debatable?
The SPEAKER. It is not.
Mr. REED. Why?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has demanded the previous question.

I wish now, in this same connection, to have the correction inserted in the daily edition, because it would not appear in that edition unless attention was called to it on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk, with the permission of the House, will read the correction to which the gentleman from Maine refers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to inquire if it is not in order for my colleague to ask the House to grant a mere formal order for the withdrawal of papers, by what authority we can undertake to proceed in this manner to transact other business?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Illinois was not a mere formal matter, but was a request requiring the action of the House in relation to the withdrawal of papers sent, the Chair supposes as a matter of course by the order of the House, to one of the committees of the House. The practice of the House has been to treat corrections of the RECORD as somewhat in the nature of privileged matters. However, if there is objection to it of course it will not be done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not objected; but simply asked the question how, if no business is to be transacted to-day, this could be done, when the request of my colleague was denied.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will of course entertain the request of the gentleman from Illinois if there be no objection; and has only intimated that it was generally understood that no business shall be transacted to-day except mere formal matters, in the absence of a quorum.

The Clerk will read the correction to which the gentleman from Maine refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the second line, under the heading, "Interstate commerce," on page 427 of the RECORD, as follows:
"Mr. REAGAN. I move to close debate on the pending amendment and on the section under consideration, and on that motion I demand the previous question.
"Mr. REED. Is that motion debatable?
"The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, but the gentleman from Texas has demanded the previous question on it.
"Mr. REED. When did the gentleman demand the previous question?
"The SPEAKER. The gentleman demanded the previous question when he was on the floor and made the motion to close debate."

The SPEAKER. The RECORD as it stands says the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] demanded the previous question on the pending section and amendment; whereas, as a matter of fact, the gentleman moved to close debate upon the amendment and the section, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

If there be no objection the proper correction will be inserted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call up the resolution of the House providing for the holiday recess with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution of the House and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 5, 1885.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, December 23, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the foregoing resolution of the House of Representatives with the following amendments:
In line 3, strike out "Saturday" and insert "Wednesday." In line 3, strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-four;" so that it will read:
"Resolved, That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, December 24, 1884, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 5, 1885."

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BEACH. Is that proposition debatable?

The SPEAKER. Although there is no rule of the House which prescribes that propositions to concur in amendments of the Senate in relation to fixing a time for adjournment are not debatable in the House, still the rule of the House prescribes that such motions when made in the House are not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the previous question.

Mr. BEACH. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better give gentlemen an opportunity to be heard upon the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I am sorry that I can not comply with the request of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 74, noes 4.

Mr. BEACH. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BEACH and Mr. RANDALL were appointed tellers.

Before the result of the vote by tellers was reported,

Mr. RANDALL said: I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question having been withdrawn, the question is on concurring in the amendments proposed by the Senate.

The amendments proposed by the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Pending the question on the motion to adjourn,

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays.

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee assignments, made necessary by changes in the membership of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee on Elections: Hiram Y. Smith, of Iowa, in place of Mr. Hepburn, resigned.

Committee on Military Affairs: Daniel Connolly, in place of William A. Duncan, deceased.

Committee on the Public Lands: James E. Campbell, of Ohio, in place of Mr. Scales, resigned.

Committee on the Territories: William D. Hill, to fill vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Evins.

Committee on Education: Charles T. O'Ferrall, in place of William A. Duncan, deceased.

Committee on Revision of the Laws: George T. Garrison, in place of W. D. Hill, resigned.

Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department: Jonathan H. Wallace, in place of Mr. Connolly.

Committee on Printing: John Bratton, to fill vacancy caused by resignation of Mr. Scales.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

On Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay: Jonathan H. Wallace, in place of Mr. Connolly, resigned.

On the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic: William E. English, in place of Mr. Evins, deceased.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House, in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, adjourned until Monday, January 5, 1885, at 12 o'clock m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAGLEY: Petition of New York Leaf Tobacco Board of Trade opposing the Spanish treaty—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WEMPLE: Of 63 citizens and ex-soldiers of Montgomery County, New York.

By Mr. WOODWARD: Of 76 citizens of Vernon County, and 74 citizens of Sank County, Wisconsin.

By Mr. WORTHINGTON: Of Norman McQueen and 70 others, of Fulton County; and of W. M. Stockdale and 60 others, citizens of Knox County, Ill.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 5, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 24, 1884, was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the credentials of JUSTIN S. MORRILL, chosen by the Legislature of Vermont a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1885; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature of the enrolled bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I.; which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 22, 1884, a report of the Chief of Engineers, with report of Lieut. Col. O. M. Poe, Corps of Engineers, concerning the Portage Lake and Lake Superior ship-canal; the interest of the State of Michigan therein; the rights, title, &c., of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company thereto, &c.; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. CONGER, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommending that a portion of the $2,000 appropriated for the purchase of teams and agricultural implements for the Lawrence school during the current fiscal year, and not required for that purpose, may be expended in the purchase of materials for the construction of washhouse, blacksmith and carpenter shops, fencing, &c.; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. DAWES, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Mrs. Sanford Makepeace, of East Weymouth, Mass., praying that her husband may be allowed an increase of pension with back pay; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Lenora W. Marshall, of Chicago, Ill., praying that she and other heirs of Thomas Hoyt, deceased, a colonel in the Revolutionary war, may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented the memorial of J. Van Allen, of New York city, remonstrating against a charter for the establishment in this country of a university to be presided over by a foreign potentate; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Atchison Wolf, of Roanoke, Ind., praying for an increase of force in the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of citizens of Ohio, members of the Society of Friends, who respectfully pray for the insertion of a clause in the pending treaty between the United States and Spain, requiring that all questions which can not be settled by the usual diplomatic methods be submitted to a board of arbitration. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of Dick Lambert Post, No. 165, Grand Army of the Republic, of Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 2522) granting a pension to John Q. Bellville; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Memorial Post, No. 141, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, favoring the purchase of the portrait of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas painted by Miss C. S. Ransom; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WILSON. I have received a memorial in the form of a protest and resolution of the Board of Trade of Council Bluffs, Iowa, in opposition to legislation tending to an extension of the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. The memorial is addressed to the Iowa delegation in Congress, but is evidently intended for the consideration of the two bodies. I therefore ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Ignatius Sargent and others, of Maine, the petition of S. H. Talbot and others, of Maine, and the petition of E. A. Barnard and others, of Maine, praying for the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of Courtland Saunders Post, No. 21, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, praying for the publication of photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

He also presented memorials of cigar-makers of Philadelphia, Bradford, Greenville, and Farrandsville, in the State of Pennsylvania, and a memorial of cigar-makers of Philadelphia, Pa.; a memorial of cigar-makers of Meadville, Pa.; a memorial of the Cigar-makers' League and Knights of Labor of Pittsburgh, Pa.; a memorial of the New York Leaf Tobacco Board of Trade, and a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union of Warren, Pa., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of marine underwriters and merchants of Philadelphia, Pa., praying an additional appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of rendering the signal service on the island of Nantucket more effective; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Mary G. Shott, of Middletown, Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of York County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the ratification of that portion of the proposed treaty between the United States and Spain which relates to tobacco and cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of Curtis Post, No. 89, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, praying for the publication of photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Managers of the Produce Exchange of New York City, urging a modification of the proposed treaty with Spain so as to admit flour from the United States on the same basis as Spanish flour as regards duty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a mass-meeting of cigar-packers, held at Concordia Assembly Rooms, in the city of New York, on the 18th ultimo, and a resolution adopted at a mass-meeting held by the cigar-makers of the city of Albany, N. Y., protesting against the ratification of the proposed treaty between Spain and the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of merchants and manufacturers of New York city, praying for the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONGER presented a memorial of Messrs. Salliotte & Raupp, of Ecorse, Mich.; a memorial of the Knights of Labor of Kalamazoo, Mich.; and a memorial of the Michigan Carbon Works of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of William H. Smart Post, No. 30, Department of Massachusetts, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the publication of certain photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented papers relating to the application of E. L. Keyes for appointment to the Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to accompany Senate bill No. 1798, heretofore referred to that committee.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the petition of Richard Dymond, of Cincinnati, representing a large mercantile firm in that city, praying for the passage of what is known as the Potter refunding bill. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Perry W. Chappell and 114 other citizens of Pike County, Indiana, praying that the name of Sasser Sullivan be placed upon the pension-roll for services in the war of the rebellion and also the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST presented a memorial of tobacconists, cigar manufacturers, and employés, of Saint Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty now pending before the Senate, known as the Spanish-American reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SAWYER presented resolutions of the State board of health of Wisconsin, in favor of the bill to provide for the establishment of a national board of health; which were referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2490) to create a revenue commission; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby created, of which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex officio a member, composed of five members of the House of Representatives elected to serve during the Forty-ninth Congress and three Senators whose terms extend beyond the present Congress by re-election or otherwise, to be called the "revenue commission," whose duty it shall be to examine and report to Congress on or before the second Monday in December, A. D. 1885, what changes and modifications ought to be made in the existing tariff and revenue laws and regulations in regard to the amount of duties and taxes imposed, and the methods employed in their collection.

SEC. 2. Said commission is empowered to organize at such time and in such manner as a majority thereof may determine. It may act through subcommittees, and hold meetings at such places within the United States as will best secure the information desired; and it shall be the duty of all the United States officials, when called upon by the commission, to furnish it with such information as they possess touching the subjects it is inquiring into.

SEC. 3. The commission is authorized to employ such stenographers and messengers as it may require. It may call for information from such persons as it may believe to be well advised in regard to the subjects it is investigating, and reduce to writing such portions of their statements as may be considered material. It is authorized to pay such persons as it calls before it the usual amount allowed for mileage and per diem to witnesses when summoned to appear before the courts of the United States, and it is empowered to procure suitable places in which to hold its meetings.

SEC. 4. All the traveling and other necessary expenses of the commission, the pay and allowance of witnesses, the compensation of stenographers and messengers, the rent of rooms, and other expenses shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated on the order of the chairman of the commission; and 1,500 copies of the report and such testimony, statements, and exhibits as the commission may direct shall be printed by the Public Printer for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 copies for the use of the Senate.

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall be selected by the respective Houses of which they are members in such manner as each House may determine.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2491) to amend section 2117 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to grazing live-stock on lands occupied by Indian tribes or nations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SHEFFIELD introduced a bill (S. 2492) to prevent the discharge from the military service of the United States of graduates from the Military Academy under the provisions of section 3 of chapter 181 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes, and for the repeal of the said section; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2493) to repeal the statute of limitations on the allowance of pension arrears, and to regulate proof in pension cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 107) tendering the thanks of Congress to the officers and men of the Greely relief expedition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2494) providing for the relief of G. Alexander Ramsay; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2436) to enable the President to accept invitations of foreign Governments to international exhibitions and to appoint commissioners thereto, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the pension claim of Peter Lennon be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLICATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all the treaties and conventions (except postal conventions) entered into by the United States the ratification whereof has been exchanged, with such notes as may be in his possession indicating such treaties or conventions, or such parts of treaties or conventions, as have been changed or abrogated; together with a synoptical and analytical index of such treaties and conventions.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that refer to all the treaties that have been made since the institution of the Government?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes; all but postal treaties. It is desirable to get out another edition for the purpose of having it printed. There has been none for ten years.

Mr. INGALLS. I was not aware of the object of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

KIOWA, COMANCHE, AND WICHITA INDIAN AGENCY.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish, for the information of the Senate, copies of the reports of the inspectors and of Special Agent P. H. Folsom, of the Indian Office, recently made, in respect to the management of the affairs of the Kiowa, Comanche, Wichita, &c., Indian agency, and of all papers relating thereto.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES, SO CALLED.

Mr. MORRILL. I give notice that I shall on Wednesday of this week call up the resolution introduced by me on the 15th of December, 1884, in relation to reciprocity treaties, so called, for the purpose of making some remarks thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] may be granted a leave of absence for fifteen days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that his colleague [Mr. LOGAN] may have leave of absence for fifteen days from this day. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 452) granting a pension to Frederick Corfe;
A bill (H. R. 2440) granting a pension to Usebus Sweet;
A bill (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris;
A bill (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Jacob Hoerth;
A bill (H. R. 3382) granting a pension to Albert Brant;
A bill (H. R. 4094) granting a pension to Henry Alden;
A bill (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily; and
Joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays.

RIGHTS IN LAND GRANTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, commencing at Order of Business 338, being the bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of railroads and canals which shall be declared forfeited by act of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that that be laid over without prejudice, inasmuch as the subject to which it relates is not yet ready for the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The bill (S. 1235) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PUGH. Let that bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can we not make some arrangement by which such cases will not have to be called every morning? Suppose the bill be allowed to retain its place on the Calendar but that it be not called in order every time we go to the Calendar, and let the same order be made with regard to the bill which has just been passed over.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Chief Clerk will not have to call these bills every morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that if the bills are not to be taken up immediately under Rule VIII, they might be passed over and placed on the Calendar under Rule IX, to be taken up then at the pleasure of the Senate on the motion of the Senators having them in charge.

Mr. PUGH. Very well; let this bill be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX, and if any action is proposed on it we can set a day for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will then be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX.

SOUTHERN MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 13) to reappropriate and apply the amount appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, to pay certain Southern mail contractors was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution has been previously considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its consideration under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it goes on the Calendar under Rule IX.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will not be in his seat until Wednesday morning. He is very much interested in the bill, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice until Wednesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the bill be passed over retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I think the bill may as well now as at any time go to the Calendar under Rule IX. It should be taken up when it can have more full discussion than under Rule VIII. Therefore I ask that the bill may go under Rule IX.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask the Senator from Michigan to allow it to be passed over informally until Wednesday. He can interpose his objection then.

Mr. CONGER. As the Senator from Massachusetts is not in his seat, I shall not make an objection to the bill being passed over informally at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being passed over retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUITS IN COLLISION CASES.

The bill (S. 1472) to permit the owners of certain vessels and cargoes to sue the United States in the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments: in line 8, to strike out "Court of Claims" and insert "district court of the United States that would have jurisdiction thereof if the case had arisen between private parties;" in line 11, after the words "arising from," to strike out the words "or attributable to;" in line 14, after the word "Court," to strike out the words "of Claims;" in line 15, after the word "authorized." to insert "to try and determine such cases according to the principles of law, and;" and in line 19, after the word "representatives," to insert "and the right of appeal shall exist as in other cases;" so as to make the bill read:

That the owner or owners of any American ship or vessel engaged in the United States merchant marine, or the owner or owners of any cargo laden thereon, or any person or persons interested in said vessels or cargos, may, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to sue the United States in the district court of the United States that would have jurisdiction thereof if the case had arisen between private parties for any damage, loss, or injury to such vessels or cargoes arising from the negligence, want of skill, or mismanagement of any vessel owned by or belonging to the United States, or those in charge thereof, by collision; and the said court is hereby authorized to try and determine such cases according to the principles of law, and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such injury, loss, or damage, if any shall be found due, in favor of the party or parties plaintiff, or their legal representatives; and the right of appeal shall exist as in other cases: Provided, however, That this act shall not extend to cases occurring more than five years prior to the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the Senator who reported the bill whether there is any provision for payment of or security for costs in any of the cases that may be commenced under this proposed law. Here is a general right to ship-owners and passengers and individuals of all classes to sue the United States where the owner or sailor or passenger may claim to have been injured. I ask whether this provision is not too general without some restriction to guard the United States?

Mr. GARLAND. The bill in that respect simply recognizes the general law as to costs with which the Senator from Michigan is familiar, and does not change it in any particular. The general law on that subject is ample, I take it, for all purposes in this proceeding.

I will state, since I am up, that the bill has been suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary in obedience to a number of petitions that have been sent here on behalf of parties owning vessels for relief who have alleged that they have suffered as the bill indicates. There was no jurisdiction, properly speaking, anywhere to try such cases. The Supreme Court held in the case of the Syren, in seventh Wallace, that a suit of this sort could not be brought without an act of Congress authorizing it, and that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims was not sufficient without enlarging that jurisdiction.

The present occupant of the chair [Mr. SHERMAN] will remember that there was a case here from Tennessee, introduced by the Senator on my right [Mr. HARRIS] on the petition of some gentlemen at Memphis. There was a special bill for that case authorizing the parties to go into the district court. The present occupant of the chair, the Senator from Ohio, offered an amendment to send them to the Court of Claims, but the Senate passed the bill as it came from the committee.

The committee have had several applications of this sort, and they have thought best not to pass a special bill upon each petition that may come up, but to have a general bill allowing all these persons to go into the district court that would otherwise have the jurisdiction to try such matters between private parties, and to relieve the difficulty that was stated in the case of the Syren, in seventh Wallace.

There is one amendment I would offer to the bill. In line 16, before the word "law," I move to insert the word "admiralty," because it is an admiralty proceeding. That then will cover the question suggested by the Senator from Michigan, because the admiralty practice regulates the matter of costs.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The Senator from Michigan has already spoken once.

Mr. CONGER. I can speak upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan can speak to the amendment, but it will be first reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 16, before the word "law," it is proposed to insert the word "admiralty;" so as to read:

And the said court is hereby authorized to try and determine such cases according to the principles of admiralty law.

Mr. CONGER. Speaking to the amendment, then, I make the inquiry whether under the provisions of the bill as it stands, even with that addition, power would be given to consolidate any claims about the same transaction.

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Should it not be so?

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection, if the Senator prefers to make it specific.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know where it comes in, but it seems to me there should be power in the court to consolidate any questions that may arise between owners and passengers of ships, or whatever it might be, concerning the same injury or the same transaction.

Mr. GARLAND. I think my amendment would relieve against that objection.

Mr. CONGER. My objection is not on that account. I think there should be some provision by which, if there were numerous actions by different claimants for the same occurrence, they might all be tried together.

Mr. GARLAND. I think so, and that is my reason for putting in the word "admiralty." That covers every question the Senator has suggested, both as to costs and as to consolidation of claims. I am pretty positive as to that, the only difference being that under admiralty the trial would be before the judge, and contributory negligence would operate only to divide the damages, whereas in a trial as at common law it would be before a jury, and contributory negligence would defeat the claim absolutely.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. I should like to ask the Senator a question. By the rules of the admiralty courts the party coming in for relief is required to give surety for costs. I ask whether that does not apply in this case. It has occurred to me, and I wish to attract the Senator's attention for a moment to the point, that this does not come under the limited-liability act. In the case of any old hulk that belongs to the United States injuring a ship and cargo, it may be, would the United States be liable for the entire amount of the injury and not limited to the value of the colliding vessel?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think that objection is tenable. If the Senator will examine the bill and the case I have referred to, which was passed upon by the Supreme Court, he will find that the bill is drafted with a view to that case and to meet the objection raised there; and it would simply give this general jurisdiction under the admiralty law under rules well known and established by the Supreme Court to carry on practice of that sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to permit the owners of certain vessels and cargoes to sue the United States."

MRS. EMILY MILLER.

The bill (S. 1320) for the relief of Mrs. Emily Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That is adversely reported. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under the adverse report.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. 896) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "$14,800" and insert "$3,100;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, State of Tennessee, the sum of $3,100, in full compensation for property taken from him for the use of and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE March 17, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 896) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

On the breaking out of the rebellion Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was the owner of the steamer New National, of about four hundred and eighty tons burden, and was engaged in regular business with said boat on the Mississippi River.

At the outbreak of the rebellion she was impressed by the confederates into their service without and against the consent of Montgomery, as he alleges. She continued in the service of the confederates from that time to June 6, 1862, when Memphis was captured by the Union forces. She was at Memphis on that day under orders from the confederate authorities to proceed down the river. Said orders were not obeyed, but after the fight Chief Clerk Nicholas M. Johnson, under the direction of said Montgomery, as he alleges, went on board the monitor Benton and delivered the New National to Admiral Davis, and Capt. Alexander Grant, of the Navy, was immediately placed in command of her, and she entered upon the service of the United States with the full consent of said Montgomery, as he alleges.

She contnued in said service from June 6, 1862, to March 20, 1863, a space of two hundred and eighty-eight days, at the expiration of which time she was turned over to said Montgomery by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and thereupon he chartered her for one year to Admiral Porter, at the rate of $50 a day, and for a second year at the rate of $65 a day.

The said Montgomery now asks that he be paid at the rate of $50 a day for the two hundred and eighty-eight days the New National was in the service of the United States, under the command of Captain Grant, amounting to the sum of $14,400.

While the New National was so held, and before March 20, 1863, she was libeled in the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois under the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes."

December 17, 1862, the district attorney for the southern district of Illinois, L. Weldon, wrote to the Solicitor of the Treasury as follows:

"A few days since I obtained in the district court of this district a decree of condemnation against two steamers, the Kentucky and the New National. The ground of condemnation is, that they carried on traffic in violation of the act of July 13, 1862, and the President's proclamation of August 16, 1861.

"The claimants have given notice of appeal to the circuit court, and intend also to make an appeal to the Treasury Department for remission of the penalty. My judgment is that in the case of the New National especially no relief should be given.

"The claimant has taken an oath of allegiance to the rebel government, and made some statements, as shown by the testimony, tending to show him at heart a disloyal man. The testimony on which he predicates his defense is taken without cross-examination and without any evidence as to the truthfulness of his witnesses.

"I have taken great trouble and expense in preparing these cases for trial, having been as far south as Memphis in taking proof. I am thoroughly satisfied, from what I know or have heard outside of the legitimate proof of the case that the New National is a fit subject of prize and capture."

The following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase, to the Solicitor of the Treasury, Edward Jordan, gives a further history of the case. The letter is dated January 16, 1863:

"Capt. Pearson Montgomery, master and owner of the steamer New National, seized and recently condemned in the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois, under the act of July 13, 1861, has made his petition before me for the remission of said seizure and release of the boat. The complete record in the case, together with a statement of United States District Judge Treat, and the evidence, are presented. From these it appears to my satisfaction that Captain Montgomery was not of his own will in the rebel service with his boat, and that, so soon as he could, he escaped therefrom and voluntarily turned her over to the Federal authorities. * * * I conceive that the discretionary power conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury of mitigating or remitting forfeitures in cases of this nature should be used to extend relief to loyal persons and to lighten the hardships of the war so far as consists with the public interest.

"In this view of the case, and for the reasons above stated, I feel justified in extending such relief as lies in my power to the petitioner, upon the usual terms. You will accordingly please instruct the proper district attorney to dismiss said suit and further proceedings against said steamer upon these conditions, namely, that the claimant shall pay all costs of whatever character incurred by the seizure and judicial proceedings, together with a fee of $100 to the United States district attorney, and agree that a certificate of probable cause of seizure shall issue from the court for the protection of the seizing officer."

Accordingly the proceedings in the circuit court were dismissed and an order made in accordance with the Secretary's letter, as appears of record in said court.

In 1880 Captain Montgomery presented his claim for $14,400 to the Treasury Department. May 25, 1880, a decision was rendered by the Third Auditor on the case rejecting it, and in July of the same year the Second Comptroller made a long examination of the case and rejected it. Captain Montgomery made two points, first, that the boat was not forfeit because it did not ply between ports one declared to be in a state of insurrection, and a port not in such a section. He maintained that though the boat did run between New Orleans, La., and Columbus, Ky., both ports were in the insurrectionary sections, even though Columbus had not been so declared by the President's proclamation of August 16, 1861.

The above-mentioned proclamation declared, among other States, Louisiana to be in a state of insurrection, but did not so declare as to Columbus, Ky.

The law authorizing such proclamation is the act of July 13, 1861, and is as follows:

"SEC. 5. It shall be lawful, &c., * * * for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares, and merchandise coming from said State or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such State or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such State or section, be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 6. That from and after fifteen days after the issuing of said proclamation, as provided in the last foregoing section of this act, any ship or vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizen or inhabitant of said State or part of a State whose inhabitants are so declared in a state of insurrection, found at sea, or in any port of the rest of the United States, shall be forfeited to the United States."

It will readily be seen that the Treasury Department could not legally decide this point different from what it did.

Captain Montgomery's second point was that the remission of the forfeiture by the Secretary of the Treasury not only restored to him his vessel, but the right to recover for her services from the time she was first seized.

Secretary Chase does not seem to have considered in his above letter that the remission of the forfeiture went to that extent. His power of remission arose under section 8 of the act of July 13, 1861, which is as follows:

"That the forfeitures and penalties incurred by virtue of this act may be mitigated or remitted in pursuance of the authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by the act entitled 'An act providing for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned, approved March 3, 1797,' or in cases where special circumstances may seem to require it, according to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The statute of March 3, 1797, gives power to the Secretary to stay the prosecution and remit the penalty, if one has been imposed, but it goes no further. There is no power in the statute, express or implied, whereby the Secretary could restore to Captain Montgomery the right to be paid for the services of his boat while under the decree of forfeiture.

The Treasury Department could not do otherwise than overrule Captain Montgomery's second point.

Under that head he also claimed that there was an implied contract on the part of the Government to pay for the boat for these 288 days.

That argument must necessarily fall, for the reason that the boat belonged to the Government by force of the statute from the moment it was used in violation of the law and the President's proclamation. It has been held that where a forfeiture is declared by statute in a case like this the forfeiture becomes complete at the moment the statute is violated.

Mr. Justice Ballard says:

"The decisions are uniform both in England and the United States. In the United States vs. Fifty-six Barrels of Whisky, &c.,' that where a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as a penalty for the commission of crime, if the denunciation is in direct terms and not in the alternative, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the Government.' "

And he adds:

"That the subsequent conviction and judgment are simply the consummation of the proceeding that the law requires to be instituted to ascertain the fact of the forfeiture." (See also United States vs. Nineteen hundred and sixty Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch, 398; Gelston vs. Hoyt, 3 Wheat., 311; Caldwell vs. United States, 8 How., 381; Wood vs. United States, 16 Peters, 362; Henderson vs. Distilled Spirits, 14 Wal., 61.)

As to the loyalty of Captain Montgomery the testimony is somewhat conflicting, but the committee are inclined to adopt the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Salmon P. Chase, that Captain Montgomery was loyal to the United States Government, and that his acts inconsistent with that were not of his own free will. It appears that as soon as the coercive acts of the confederates were removed he voluntarily surrendered the New National to the United States.

It can not be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury intended at the time he remitted to Captain Montgomery the forfeiture, and requiring him to pay the costs and $100, that he was to have a claim against the Government up to that time for the use of it during the time it was in possession of the Government and while it was in fact the property of the Government. Such a supposition is simply absurd.

The remission of the forfeiture can not have the effect of giving the right claimed in this case.

The statute of March 3, 1797, gives power to the Secretary to stay the prosecution and remit the penalty, if one has been imposed, but it goes no further. It does not confer the power to set aside or reverse the judgment. Its effect is to remit the penalty and restore the property, but the judgment and all its attendant disabilities, except those so remitted, stand, and the claimant is affected thereby.

But it appears from this case that this remission of the forfeiture was on the 16th day of January, 1863, but that the vessel remained in the use of the Government and was not surrendered to the claimant till the 20th day of March following, a period of sixty-two days. It does not distinctly appear where the boat was during this time. It does not appear but that the Government had the use of it during this time. The claimant alleges that it had, and the evidence tends strongly to show it. This point does not seem to have been considered at all by either the Third Auditor or the Comptroller of the Treasury.

The committee think it would be just that the claimant should be paid for the use of the boat during this time. After the 20th of March, when the boat came into the possession of Captain Montgomery, the Government paid him $50 a day for the first year and $65 per day for its use thereafter.

The committee therefore recommend that the claimant be allowed for the said sixty-two days at $50 per day, amounting to $3,100; that the bill be amended so as to read for that amount instead of $14,400, and when so amended that it pass.

Amend the bill by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "fourteen" and "eight," and insert in place thereof the words "three" and "one."

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, in reading this report I inquired of myself on what principle, on what ground the committee have made a recommendation for the payment of this money during the sixty-two days mentioned herein. This is a vessel that was seized and actually in the possession of the confederate government, belonging to it, laden with its property, or so far seized that the gunboat was in its neighborhood, and the captain or an officer of the boat, it is said, surrendered the boat to this Government. The committee have reported in favor of this claim. They have not reported in the bill that this payment shall be in full for this claim and for all claims which the owner of this vessel may have against the Government.

I think the bill should not pass, and I shall vote against it; but I suggest to those who are in favor of the bill that if it is to pass they should enact that this payment shall be in full of all claims of the owner of said vessel against the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Does the Chair understand the Senator from Michigan to move an amendment?

Mr. CONGER. I do not. I do not care myself to perfect the bill. I propose to oppose it, and vote against it at any rate, but for the interest of the United States I think there should be some provision on the point I have mentioned if the bill is to be passed and become a law.

Mr. PIKE. The Committee on Claims considered this claim and were unanimous that it ought to be paid to the extent of the $3,100 proposed to be allowed. This steamer, the New National, was, as the Senator from Michigan says, libeled in court and condemned. An appeal was taken by the claimant, Mr. Montgomery, to a higher court. While that was pending, an application was made to the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Salmon P. Chase, who had the authority to stay the prosecution and remit the penalty under the statute of March 3, 1797. He exercised that right, stayed the prosecution, and remitted the penalty. After this was all done, after the vessel was free, the Government continued to use it for the sixty-two days here provided for. The committee could see no reason why for that time the claimant ought not to be paid. There is some question as to the other time. The bill as amended only provides for payment for the sixty-two days, which it seems to me is amply just.

The Senator from Michigan says there ought to be some provision that this shall be in full. It seems to me to be so already. In the seventh line after the proposed amendment the bill reads:

In full compensation for property taken from him for the use of and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

That seems to me ample to meet the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The question being taken by a division, resulted—ayes 28, noes 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll of the Senate will be called, there being not a quorum voting.

Mr. CONGER. Can we not take the vote over again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the call of the roll may be dispensed with.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that. I do not insist upon a further vote on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is then, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE AND DEVISE OF DISTRICT REAL ESTATE.

The bill (S. 754) in regard to the conveyance and devise of real estate in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 5, line 2, after the word "shall," to strike out "make transcripts upon his books of" and insert "record;" before the word "transcripts," in line 4, to strike out "such" and insert "certified;" and after the word "transcripts" to insert "thereof;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the register of wills in the District of Columbia shall record all wills filed in his office and admitted to probate; and certified transcripts thereof shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of the contents of such wills.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the bill ought to go over. It is a very important bill. Have the Judiciary Committee considered the bill, I ask the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir; the bill has not been before that committee, so far as I know.

Mr. INGALLS. It was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It refers entirely to devises and bequests of real estate within the District.

Mr. MORGAN. I have great faith in the ability of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I have no doubt the bill has been well considered. At the same time it takes hold of a question which it seems to me could be more properly considered by the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, because it is a measure affecting the rights of everybody, changing the law as it exists, I have no doubt—the laws of Maryland and the common law as applied in the District heretofore. I object to its consideration at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it goes over.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

The bill (S. 536) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. That is adversely reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. That being reported adversely, let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator who reported that being absent, I suggest that it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas object to its consideration?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it keep its place. It is a bill in which the Military Committee take a great deal of interest, and I hope it will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to its retaining its place, though I confess that I am unable to see the advantage that a bill has by being kept under the operation of Rule VIII. If passed over and placed under Rule IX it is still subject to the direction of a majority of the Senate at any time when they see fit to call it up. If kept under Rule VIII the objection is that every morning when we begin this Calendar we call over and over and over again the same cases and they are passed over informally, retaining their location on the Calendar. It certainly does not prejudice the passage of a bill by having it put under Rule IX, and it advances the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will not the Senator be kind enough to let this lie until the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] comes back?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection; but he has had leave of absence for fifteen days this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to passing over, the bill retaining its place on the Calendar?

Mr. HARRIS. To obviate the objection—and it is one that pertains to all of us—of having to call the cases that have been passed over informally holding their places on the Calendar subject to the call of the Senator having them in charge, I suggest that the Secretary be directed to place all such bills at the foot of the Calendar, letting them remain subject to the call of the Senator having them in charge. That will obviate the necessity of having to call them over every morning when we begin on the Calendar. Of course I have no objection to this bill being informally passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair could not give such a direction without an order of the Senate, as it changes the rule and puts the bills practically where they are under Rule IX, where on the motion of any Senator after 1 o'clock or after the morning business is through, and without debate, the Senate can take up any case.

Mr. HARRIS. My suggestion is that it shall not require a motion, but be taken up on the call of the Senator having the bill in charge. I will put it in the form of a resolution at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this bill being passed over, retaining its place? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INSPECTION OF EXPORTED MEATS.

The bill (S. 1876) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. That can hardly be considered in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That bill may as well go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the effect of its going over under objection.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill be passed over without prejudice until the return of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. LAPHAM. That bill can not be considered under Rule VIII. It involves a discussion which can not take place under that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from New York will not make objection now. I ask him to withhold any objection he may have until the Senator from Kansas returns.

Mr. LAPHAM. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this bill being passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILBUR F. COGSWELL.

The bill (S. 54) for the relief of Wilbur F. Cogswell was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is adversely reported. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think the bill may as well be indefinitely postponed, so as to get it off the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his objection. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from California moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

F. PROSH AND T. F. M'ELROY.

The bill (S. 954) for the relief of F. Prosh and T. F. McElroy was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. There is an adverse report in that case, and I suggest that the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon objects to the consideration of the bill. It will be passed over.

ERASTUS W. BABSON.

The bill (S. 772) granting a pension to Erastus W. Babson was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has passed the Senate, and now stands on a motion to reconsider. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BLAIR. That bill is on the Calendar pending the production of some evidence bearing on the case by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. At his request I desire that it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire it to be passed over retaining its place or passed to the Calendar under Rule IX?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just simply useless to keep bills under Rule VIII and call them continually on the Calendar. We spend the entire morning hour every morning in calling cases passed over, and I am going to object to all the rest of them and all those that are on the Calendar, so that we shall know when we commence that we are to consider cases and not spend the hour every morning in calling up cases that are to be passed over.

Mr. BLAIR. Let this bill go over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

STATE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 1273) for the relief of the State University of California was announced as next in order.

Several SENATORS. That is reported adversely.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Let it go over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and will be passed over.

WILLIAM C. DODGE.

The bill (S. 1399) for the relief of William C. Dodge was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William C. Dodge, of Washington, D. C., of —— dollars, for a cartridge-loading machine furnished by him to the United States upon an order from the Ordnance Department, and for the use of his invention of the same, and of the patent therefor, dated July 17, 1866, and for his improvement in cartridges patented July 4, 1865, and for the infringement of his patents by the United States, which sum of —— dollars is to be in full satisfaction of all claims for such use and infringements and for the relinquishment of all right to claim any further compensation for the use of the same by the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the whole case depends on filling the blanks.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is an amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report is called for. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL March 24, 1884:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1399) for relief of William C. Dodge, respectfully report:

That the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives have reported a similar bill favorably at the present session, fixing the compensation of Mr. Dodge for the use of his patent at $10,000.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with amendments, inserting in the blanks in lines 6 and 14 the words "ten thousand," for reasons set forth in the House report, which is as follows:

"[House Report No. 737, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4670) for the relief of William C. Dodge, have investigated the subject, and report as follows:

"It appears from the testimony that the operation of filling cartridge-cases with powder had always been performed by hand down to 1864, and that it was a very dangerous work, explosions frequently occurring, destroying life and property, despite the utmost precautions.

"June 17, 1864, an explosion occurred in the cartridge-filling shops at the arsenal in Washington, D. C., where one hundred and fifty operatives were employed; which killed twenty-one persons, and seriously injured many others, who were buried among the burning ruins.

"That in consequence of this disaster the petitioner conceived the idea that this work might be done by a machine, and after consultation with the officers in charge, who expressed doubts as to the feasibility of his plan, but encouraged him to try, he devised a machine, had a small one made, and submitted it to the Department for trial. Colonel Benton, then in charge of the arsenal, in his official report under date of December 27, 1864, after describing the machine, and the tests to which he had submitted it, concludes with this statement:

"'The principle of this machine is a good one, and a machine properly constructed on it would, I think, give greater uniformity of weight to the charges, and work could be turned out more uniformly, rapidly, and safely than at present done by the hand process.'

"The result was so satisfactory that four days thereafter the Department gave petitioner an order to furnish a full-sized machine which should fill one hundred cartridges at a time.

"After much trouble and expense the machine was delivered August 18, 1865. It was officially tested and approved, and in his report dated February 15, 1866, Colonel Benton says:

"'It can be worked at the rate of six slidesful per minute, or about 360,000 per day, so that one such machine would fill as many cartridges as could be made by any one establishment. If a greater number, however, were required to be filled, the capacity of the machine could be easily increased by increasing the number of holes in the slides and drawer.

"'For cartridges like those of Sharps and those with copper cases (now used), the use of this machine affords a considerable saving of time, as one machine can do the work of many hands.'

"The great merit of the invention, however, consists in providing means for insuring uniformity of charge, which the present Chief of Ordnance, in a letter to the committee, says is 'a very important matter,' and that he 'knows of no machine prior to that invented by the petitioner that provided any means for that purpose.'

"He also says 'Mr. Dodge's invention seems to antedate anything of the kind in this country.'

"The invention has been embodied in all machines since built and used by the Government, the present machines being so modified as to also put the bullets into the copper shells, and then crimp the shells on the bullets to unite them and render the cartridge water-tight. Prior to this invention all cartridges made by the Government had been filled by hand. Since this invention they have all been filled by machines operating on this principle, and doubtless always will be, not only because of the saving in time and expense, but also because of the greater uniformity with which they can be filled, and which General Dyer, then Chief of Ordnance, said was of more value to the Government than the proposed saving of life and property.

"The benefits of this invention to the Government are many. The saving in the cost of filling the cartridges made since its adoption has been from $15,000 to $20,000. It has greatly reduced the risk to both life and property, has enabled the Department to concentrate the business at a single arsenal, thereby enabling the Government to dispense with a large number it formerly had located at various points, and the expense of keeping them up, and enables the work to be performed with immensely greater rapidity in cases of emergency and far more perfectly.

"From the nature of the invention, it is one that is of value to the Government only, as it is a thing that can not be sold to or used by the public at large.

"The petitioner has never been paid a cent, either for the machine furnished on the order of the Department, or for the use of his invention. The Chief of Ordnance says that 'he is entitled to remuneration,' and the Secretary of War also says he ought to be paid.

"The petitioner also claims that the Government has used for several years a patented improvement of his in cartridges, but as that was a matter of minor importance the committee have not given it any consideration in arriving at their conclusion in this case.

"The committee are unanimously of the opinion that the petitioner is justly entitled to remuneration, both for the machine furnished and for the use of his invention, and therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage, with an amendment fixing the amount to be paid Mr. Dodge at $10,000."

The amendments reported by the Committee on Patents were to fill the blanks in line 6 and line 14 by inserting the words "ten thousand."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. In order to prevent any possible misconstruction of this bill, I move to amend where the word "use" occurs, toward the end of the bill, by inserting "past or future."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in line 16, before the word "use," to insert "past or future."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the bill as amended be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William C. Dodge, of Washington, D. C., the sum of $10,000, for a cartridge-loading machine furnished by him to the United States upon an order from the Ordnance Department, and for the use of his invention of the same, and of the patent therefor, dated July 17, 1866, and for his improvement in cartridges patented July 4, 1865, and for the infringement of his said patents by the United States; which said sum of $10,000 shall be in full satisfaction of all claims for such use and infringements, and for the relinquishment of all right to claim any further compensation for the past or future use of the same by the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the committee in this case to hold that the United States is liable to damages for the infringement of the patent?

Mr. MITCHELL. The committee considered no proposition of that kind. The committee were unanimous in reporting this bill. There is no objection to it at all. I was directed to prepare the report, and simply presented the case as it was presented in the House of Representatives. Unquestionably the invention has been of very considerable value to the Government, especially in the protection of human life. It is a very interesting discovery. It operates most admirably. The principal benefit undoubtedly, so far as the filling of the cartridges is concerned, is that suggested in the report, that it makes them all of equal quantity; but the prime consideration with me at least was that it was a very great security to human life. A reference to the case of the accident in this city recalls to the minds of Senators a circumstance which appealed to our sympathies at that time, and the use of this machine avoids that danger.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is this the only machine of the kind the Government is using for this purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL. The only machine ever invented and used for this purpose, as I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report leaves that indefinite. I object to the word "infringement" in the bill. The Government is not liable to damages for infringement, and it is a very bad expression to use in the body of a bill, that the Government is liable for any infringement. I do not understand from the report that this is the only machine that is used. If this is only a stepping-stone to eight or ten other patentees to come in and claim compensation for the use of machines of the same character I should like to know it; that is the only question with me. If this is the only machine the Government is using for this purpose compensation ought to be made. I am perfectly satisfied of that. But if this is only one of a number of machines, and the others have been used in the same way, we are establishing a precedent for allowing fifty or one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, I should like to know that fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand there never has been any such machine invented by any other person. It is so stated in a communication among the papers, I think, from the War Department. There is no question as to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. No other claimant?

Mr. MITCHELL. The inventor of this machine furnished a model first and afterward furnished a machine to the Government. He never has been paid even for the expense, which was quite considerable, that he was put to in order to produce the model and the machine which was used by the Government. It is a kind of patent which can only be used by the Government to any extent. There are many instances where compensation has been made to inventors for inventions used by the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt about that; I do not object to that. I think it is perfectly right in many instances to make compensation.

Mr. LAPHAM. The bill and the report disclose that this $10,000 is for the use by the Government of this invention. The use of the term "infringement," though it may be in the bill, does not make it compensation for an infringement. It is compensation for the benefit the Government has derived from the use of the invention and will derive in the future. As the Senator from Pennsylvania reporting the bill has said, really this is an invention which can be profitably used only by the Government. It is not adapted to private use for small arms. It is only adapted to the use of large arms for cartridges which are required by the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' ORPHANS' HOME.

The bill (S. 1578) to amend the charter of the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home, and in relation to the assets thereof, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire from some one familiar with the bill whether the trustees of this organization turned over by some authority of law their building, the orphan asylum, or the proceeds of it, to the Garfield Hospital. I see there is no report in this case.

Mr. GARLAND. Instead of making a report on this bill, I submitted with the papers a letter which explains the whole matter.

Mr. CONGER. I do not care to have it all read, but I wished to inquire whether it was this institution which owned the building of the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home that was authorized to be passed over to the Garfield Hospital.

Mr. GARLAND. My recollection is that this relates simply to an individual transaction, and what the bill proposes is a mere formal proceeding to get the title divested, and the Government has no responsibility about it at all. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. CONGER. I understand there was a building, which I supposed belonged to this same association, which by some authority of Congress was authorized to be transferred, or the proceeds of the sale of it, to the Garfield Hospital, a building to the west of the Winder block.

Mr. GARLAND. I examined the papers. Let the bill be passed over, if the Senator from Michigan objects, until to-morrow morning, and I will get the necessary papers.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the passage of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). I think I can state, as I remember about it, for the information of the Senator from Michigan, that this bill applies to a little sum of money that was given in a will to certain trustees—Dr. Sunderland, I remember, is one—to be paid to certain orphans of certain soldiers. They paid all they could find, long ago, but there are some whose place of residence or what has become of them they can not possibly find, and they have a few hundred dollars in their hands. They are of course personally responsible, and it disturbs the settlement of their estates. They wish to put that money in the Treasury so that these orphans, if found, can go there and get it and they be relieved of responsibility. That is all the bill does.

Mr. CONGER. It does not affect at all the transfer of this property?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not affect the rest of it at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1450) for the readjustment of compensation for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes.

Mr. CONGER. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. PALMER], who reported this bill, I ask that it go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NEZ PERCÉ INDIAN WAR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 512) for the relief of citizens of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana who served in connection with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percé Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been considered was indefinitely postponed, and on the 25th of March last the vote postponing the bill was reconsidered. * The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no reason why the bill should be passed. It was indefinitely postponed on the report of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], and I suppose the object of the reconsideration was simply to examine the report that was made. I do not remember on whose motion the reconsideration was had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. COCKRELL. He is not here. I object to its consideration. That will put it on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it goes over.

SCHOONER ADDIE B. BACON.

The bill (S. 748) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Addie B. Bacon to the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "Court of Claims" and insert "district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania;" so as to read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of the legal owner or owners of the schooner Addie B. Bacon, her cargo, freight, and personal effects, alleged to have been damaged by collision with the United States steam-ram Alarm on or about the 8th day of July, 1876, be referred to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, to hear and determine the same to judgment, with right of appeal as in other cases: Provided, That no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of the passage thereof.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE March 24, 1884:

The committee report that this claim was before them in the last Congress, and was then fully considered. They refer for the facts to the report then made, which is as follows:

"That the schooner Addie B. Bacon, about the 8th day of July, 1876, was run into and injured by the United States steam ram Alarm and seriously injured is established by the evidence. It seems also from the ex parte showing made that the schooner was wholly without fault. The petitioner only asks for leave to sue in the Court of Claims, where the facts can be fully investigated. The committee believe that such an investigation should be allowed, and therefore report back the accompanying bill (S. 1083), and recommend its passage."

The collision took place in the Delaware River, near Philadelphia, and near the eastern shore. The committee believe the more appropriate tribunal to adjudicate this claim is the United States district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and they recommend that the bill be amended by striking out, in lines 7 and 8, "Court of Claims" and inserting "district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania," and, when so amended, that it pass.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator who has charge of this bill how it is that we are to get this claim into a district court of the United States by a reference from Congress. I do not understand any legal procedure of that kind as obtaining now, and I do not know how we can confer that jurisdiction upon a district court by a special bill of this character. If the parties were authorized to sue in that court instead of the Court of Claims, that would confer jurisdiction; but merely to transfer the cause to the district court without giving jurisdiction to that court would not reach the remedy intended to be given by this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I see that the bill was reported by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] who is now absent. I suggest that the bill be passed over without prejudice until to-morrow.

Mr. GROOME. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not press that suggestion. The Senator from Mississippi reported this bill in the Forty-seventh Congress, recommending that the case should go to the Court of Claims as the bill was originally framed. He has evidently been overruled by the committee in the present instance. I think the original report was right, and that the proper course would be to reject the amendment and refer the case to the Court of Claims, and I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I withdraw that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I concur with the Senator from Maryland that the amendment had better not be agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will obviate the objection made by the Senator from Alabama. I think the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The committee proposed to amend the title so as to make it read:

A bill referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Addie B. Bacon to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee to the title.

The amendment was rejected.

SPOKANE FALLS AND CŒUR D'ALENE RAILWAY.

The bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. That bill has been discussed to some extent in the Senate and several amendments offered. The objections made to the bill were partly answered in the limited period allowed for discussion. I object to its consideration now, so that it may go over to Rule IX, and I shall move hereafter to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to goes over.

LIEUT. H. R. LEMLY, U. S. A.

The joint resolution (S. R. 61) to authorize Lieut. Henry R. Lemly, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the United States of Colombia was announced as next in order.

Mr. LAPHAM. There is an adverse report in that case.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator who reported that case I believe is not present. Both the Senators representing the State of which this gentleman is a citizen are absent, and there is an adverse report. It had better be objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is objected to and goes over.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT JUSTICES.

The bill (S. 880) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate proceedings before them, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" in line 10, after the word "office," to strike out "and;" and in line 11, after the word "written," to insert "and cases of breach of promise to marry;" so as to make the section read:

That justices of the peace of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all pleas and actions, including attachment and replevin, where the amount claimed to be due or the value of the property sought to be recovered shall not exceed $300, except in cases where the title to real estate is concerned, actions for malicious prosecution, actions against justices of the peace or other officers for misconduct in office, actions for slander, verbal or written, and cases of breach of promise to marry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 7, to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" and at the end of the section to insert "and where the sum claimed exceeds $20 either party shall be entitled to a trial by jury, which trial shall be governed by the same rules as are now in force in the supreme court of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That such jurisdiction shall be exclusive original jurisdiction where the amount claimed to be due or the value of the property sought to be recovered shall not exceed $100, and original and concurrent with the supreme court of the District of Columbia where the amount claimed to be due or the value of the property sought to be recovered is more than $100 but does not exceed $300; and where the sum claimed exceeds $20 either party shall be entitled to a trial by jury, which trial shall be governed by the same rules as are now in force in the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the third section, "nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be received in the appellate court, and costs;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That no appeal shall be allowed from the judgment of a justice of the peace in any common-law action unless the matter in demand in such action or pleaded in set-off thereto shall exceed the sum of $20, nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 10, to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That whenever any constable shall neglect or refuse to pay over to the party entitled thereto any moneys collected or received by him, on any process issued by a justice of the peace, the justice issuing such process may, upon complaint of such party, summon the said constable and the sureties upon his official bond to appear before him, at a day and hour therein named, and not less than two days after service of such summons, to answer to the said complainant, and may render judgment against the said constable and his sureties for the amount so collected or received, if not exceeding $300, with interest and costs, and execution may issue therefor without stay, except by appeal; and when the sum claimed exceeds $20 either party shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 6, after the word "person," to strike out the words "of proper" and insert "over 21 years of;" so as to read:

SEC. 6. That in proceedings under the provisions of chapter 19 ("Landlord and tenant") of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, where the tenant can not be found so that personal service can be made upon him, service of process may be made by leaving a copy of such process with some person over 21 years of age upon the premises, or in the absence of such tenant or person, then process may be served by fixing a copy of the same to a conspicuous part of the premises where it may be conveniently read; and the officer shall in his return state the manner of such service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 7 in the following words:

SEC. 7. That in cases of appeal or on certiorari the justice shall retain all original papers, except those filed in evidence, and make and file with the appellate court copies of the papers so retained, certified by himself; and for preparing and transmitting the papers on appeal or certiorari he shall be paid a fee of $1; but the superior court may require the production of the original papers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [10] 9, line 3, to strike out the words "and a change of venue may be taken as in other cases;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That the justice shall enter such cases on his docket, and the trial shall be had therein in the same manner as in other trials before justices of the peace.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [13] 12, line 5, after the word "his," to strike out "agents" and insert "agent;" so as to read:

SEC. 12. That the judgment in such cases shall be a complete indemnity to the constable in proceeding to sell or restore any such property; and in case of appeal the constable shall retain such property, unless the party claiming, or the defendant in the execution, or his agent, shall enter into a bond, with sufficient security for the delivery of such property to the officer if the judgment of the court shall be against the party giving such bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 14. That civil cases tried by the justice without a jury shall be decided by him, and judgment rendered not later than the fourth day after trial, except when the fourth day falls on Sunday, when judgment may be rendered on the day following.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to hear the section in regard to appeals read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section referred to will be again read.

The SECRETARY. Section 3 as amended reads:

SEC. 3. That no appeal shall be allowed from the judgment of a justice of the peace in any common-law action unless the matter in demand in such action or pleaded in set-off thereto shall exceed the sum of $20, nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me that the requirement of a bond for the payment of a judgment and the costs, which may be very large, is rather a harsh measure. As I understand an appeal can not be for any amount under $20. I do not know whether it refers to anything over $20. I wish the committee who have charge of the bill would explain that matter.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the proposed amendment in regard to extending the jurisdiction of the justices be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment extending jurisdiction was to $300.

Mr. CONGER. I see in reading this bill that there is to be no appeal unless the judgment "shall exceed the sum of $20, nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs." It seems to me that that would defeat the ends of justice and no poor man could get into any court at all, nor if a man was ever so much wronged by a judgment, could he make an appeal unless he entered into a bond with sureties to pay the final judgment and all the costs. That amendment, I believe, has been adopted. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which that was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the vote adopting the amendment just read be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. What amendment is it that the Senator from Michigan refers to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to section 3.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not remember what is text and what is amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The text will first be reported, and then the amendment.

The Secretary read section 3 as it originally stood, and then the amendment, which was to add:

Nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. As I understand the bill, in all cases there is to be a right to trial by jury where more than $20 is involved. Under this amendment may not a justice of the peace decide and render judgment where the claim is more than $20? That being so, would not the clogging of an appeal by requiring a bond to pay the amount of the judgment be invading the right of trial by jury? I remember a case decided in the circuit court of the United States where Mr. Justice Curtis decided that it was not allowable to clog the right of appeal in this way, and I apprehend the same rule would obtain here in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment to section 3.

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 it is proposed to add:

Nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill was reported by the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who is not in his seat at this time. I see the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived and I shall simply call for the regular order so that the Senator from Kansas may be present when the bill is considered.

CHEYENNE AND ARAPAHOE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 2d instant from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing certain papers in relation to the present condition of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in the Indian Territory, and recommending that some provision of law be enacted for disarming those and other Indians when such action may be found necessary for their advancement in civilized pursuits, and that means be provided for compensating the Indians for the weapons so taken from or surrendered by them.

The subject is commended to the favorable consideration and action of the Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 5, 1885.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada, and the bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the first in the list of special orders, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, whoever expects that a single act of Congress, however efficiently it may be executed, will eliminate from our transportation system the evils which have become parts of it will be disappointed. Nor do I include in the term "evils" many of those acts and omissions which excite the complaints of individuals concerning their personal affairs, as contradistinguished from those which, because of their more general effect, come to be regarded as matters of public moment. But whether we come to treat of the general subject from considerations affecting the one or the other or both of the suggested elements of the case, we shall surely find that no single act of Congress, however perfectly framed on the basis of present knowledge, and however wisely administered by those to whom its execution may be committed, will reach and wholly remedy the complicated disease which afflicts our transportation system. But this is no sufficient reason why the patient should not receive attention or why we should restrain ourselves from endeavors to discover and formulate a course of action which may ultimately effect an eradication of the disease. Because this may not be done at once, and in a measure perfectly, serves to disclose the difficulties that surround the subject but should not induce discouragement and enforce inaction.

The bill now commanding the attention of the Senate, while not fully coming up to the standard requisite to measure the great proportions of the subject with which it deals, is not exceptional in this regard. All of the bills which have been, from time to time, proposed have disclosed this defect; and all which may in the present and near future come to us for action will, in some degree, trouble us with their imperfections. But the present bill does possess one virtue which I hope may so far commend it to the favor of the Senate as to assure its passage. It proposes that this Government shall make a start in the matter of so regulating by law the great transportation service of this country as to ultimately put it into right lines of action as regards the relations which exist between it and the public. No single act of Congress can do more than to make a wise, just, conservative start concerning this very grave and very great subject; and I mean to include in the terms here used all of the powers and parties and interests embraced within the present conditions and future possibilities of the transportation question. Indeed wise, just, and conservative action can not be had by any movement which fails to considerately regard any material element of the case. And all experience teaches us that disaster is more likely to spring from attempts to do too much at the beginning of movements in the field of legislative action embracing complex subjects of public interest and concern, such as this bill relates to, than from the hesitation which evidences that cautious deliberation which, while it may lack speed, gives promise of enduring results.

To begin right is the prime factor in all reforms. If no mistake be made in this regard each successive step is most likely to be twofold in character and effect. It will define a permanent advance and at the same time disclose how others may be made. No matter how extended the ramifications of such an evil as this bill treats of may be, they can be traced, and it can be removed, if the instrumentality directed thereto be rightly selected, its effects intelligently observed and assured by the adoption of such means as they indicate. Hence, in dealing with the transportation question, notwithstanding its magnitude and complex character, we have a rule for our safe guidance, and if we but give it due consideration we shall not go wrong and do mischief instead of effecting a needed reform by eliminating evils detrimental to the general welfare.

Mr. President, many persons who have given more or less thought to the phases of the transportation question which now confront us doubt whether or not the present bill will accomplish the purposes of the committee which reported it. I should join the ranks of the doubters if I did but regard this bill the end of effort instead of the beginning. Viewed from the latter standpoint, it seems to me that the measure is one of sufficient merit to command my support. Therefore, notwithstanding I have proposed several amendments to the bill, it is not my purpose to interfere with its declaratory provisions, nor its general structure. The adoption of the amendments will not stay the operation of any essential provision of the bill should it become a law. The regulations and restraints imposed on corporations and others engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce, the declarations of right, powers, and duties affecting whosoever may come within the scope of the bill, including the commission established by its terms, will all go on and have their legitimate office and effect as fully as in the absence of said amendments. For while they definitely deal with several of the most pronounced and generally complained of evils of the present methods of the transportation system, it is only in a way calculated to bring to our aid, at the beginning of the first regular session of the next Congress, such light as may come from definite data and exact information to be derived by the commission by virtue of the investigation it is directed to make on the lines of inquiry defined by the terms of the amendments. In the mean time, should the bill become a law, we will have had the results derived from several months of its practical operation. This will test the question as to whether or not we have made a wise beginning, and the results of the commission's investigation will indicate the lines on which we may pursue further effective action. Surely such a course of action is sufficiently conservative to commend itself to every mind desirous of that proper caution which, in the end, always tends to impress stability on the institutions, laws, and other results to which it leads.

Mr. President, we have crossed the line at which the transportation companies once stood and challenged the power of Congress to do the things which this bill and the amendments propose. Indeed Congress was invited to cross it by one of said companies. A New Jersey company claimed a monopoly of the carrying trade between Philadelphia and New York. A rival company entered the field and carried freight and passengers to and from the two cities. The former company asserted its monopoly in the court of New Jersey and obtained a decree requiring its rival to account for and pay over to it all earnings received from said traffic, and perpetually enjoining it from transporting through freight and passengers between the said cities. What did the enjoined company do? It came to Congress and presented a petition praying for the passage of an act to authorize it to engage in the business in respect of which the chancellor of New Jersey had enjoined it. The proper committee of the House of Representatives, after due consideration of the petition, reported a bill to grant and give effect to the prayer thereof, basing its action on that provision of the Constitution which confers on Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." But the bill so reported related solely to the restrained New Jersey company, and proposed to exercise this great power for the mere purpose of resolving this contest between two local corporations created by the laws of the State of New Jersey.

This was in the Thirty-ninth Congress, of which I was a member. It seemed to me that if the power was to be exercised at all it should be in form of a general application to the subject involved, and be made to include all of the railroads of the country. In pursuance of this view I prepared and offered an amendment to the bill reported from the committee, which was adopted and became a part of the act approved June 15, 1866, entitled "An act to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States." The amendment thus proposed by me and now a part of said act is in these words, namely:

That every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination.

That this exercise of the commercial power of Congress was, and is, satisfactory to the transporting companies of the country is uninterruptedly evidenced on all of their lines, in every State of the Union, and during every day of the year. It is because of this exercise of the now undisputed power of Congress that solid passenger trains run from New York to Chicago, to Saint Louis, to New Orleans, and other points; that sleeping and hotel cars traverse the continent; that freight goes from Maine to California, from Chicago to New Orleans, along all lines and over all distances in the same cars and without breaking bulk. This is a great reform over old methods which changed freight and passengers at the end of each several company's line. It was a right start in the exercise of this great power in the field of operation to which the act referred to applies. It was induced by friction in the affairs of two New Jersey companies. Its results are accepted, praised, and defended by all companies, and approved by the entire country.

The principle embedded in the act of June 15, 1866, is broader than any application that has yet been given to it by the railroad companies whose operations now go on under it. They seem to treat that act as one which does no more than confer certain privileges on them. Neither the rule of public policy involved nor the terms of the act will justify such conclusion. Heretofore, and in a different place from this, I expressed my views of this particular phase of the case in language which I apply to it here to-day, namely:

No one can doubt what the rule of public commercial policy thus established is, nor question its wisdom. The policy is, through lines of transportation for passengers and freight passing from one State to another State—the abolition of unnecessary changes, delays, breaking of bulk, and attendant wastage, cost, charges, and loss of time. These were to end, so far, at least, as the means at the command of the railway companies could be utilized to effect that result. Commerce was to be facilitated. This rule was established not merely for the benefit of railroad companies, for their convenience and greater profit, but for the advancement of the interests of the great and constantly augmenting interstate commerce of the country, and of every one connected therewith, either as passenger, or shipper, or producer, or consumer of things transported.

That legislation did not merely confer a privilege on railroad companies, which they might use or not, at their pleasure. Running with this privilege, and inseparable from it, is the duty of using it for the public good, a duty which constitutes the consideration for which the privilege was granted to them.

The purpose of the act referred to was clearly stated in its title. It was: "An act to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States." Its enactment was the exercise of a great constitutional power for a public purpose. It established a public policy. The authority conferred on railroad companies within the definition of the act was equivalent to a command. The authority to do was associated with the duty to do; and with this duty ran every obligation imposed on common carriers by the common law, and such additions thereto or modifications thereof as Congress had declared or may by law provide. The facility extended to interstate commerce was not confined to its mere movement over the lines of the several railroad companies, but included as well its equality, its convenience, and its protection. It was not the purpose of the act, nor the office of the public policy thereby established, to create burdens, impose restraints, and to obstruct the ways of interstate commerce; its declared purpose was to facilitate commercial communication; in other words, "to make easy or less difficult, to free from difficulty or impediment, to lessen the labor of" the movements of the interstate commerce of the country. Whatever contravenes the rule of public policy thus declared by Congress is unlawful.

The employments of men and the results and movements thereof constitute commerce. This definition embraces producers, dealers, transporters, and consumers. They are all present in interstate commerce. Neither may impose arbitrary restraints on the others which tend to destroy equal freedom of action in the lines of lawful commercial movements. The transporters should be the great conserving force of commerce, and this they would be if kept within the lines of obligation and duty through which alone they can best promote the general welfare. But when they depart from this rule and interfere with those normal conditions of business which are induced by freedom of choice and action on the part of those who create and pursue it, they cease to conserve its best interests and obstruct the general welfare; and this is just what the transporters of this country have done and still are doing. They are not content to administer their own affairs and let the other factors of business and commerce do the same with theirs, but on the contrary they have intermeddled with everything and forced upon the country abnormal conditions patent to all observing minds. It is this fact, more than all others combined, that has caused the existing manifestation of popular irritation relative to the railroad corporations of the country.

Nor will this state of popular feeling cease until these intermeddling practices shall come to an end. The people of this country can not be brought to an acceptance of the abnormal system of forced combination and centralization with which the transporting corporations have bound to their own real or supposed convenience the industries of the country. I am glad to feel assured that this is so; for I can not believe that the present tendency to drive the manufacturing industries and all who employ and are employed therein to a comparatively few localities will tend to conserve the best public interests, whether we regard them from the standpoints of moral, material, or political consideration, singly or combined. The system is repressive and unjust. A body politic can no more thrive under a system which confines the vital forces represented by its employments, its business, its commerce to a few points than can a natural body whose life currents are obstructed and denied their normal action. A self-reliant man, whose independence and individuality assert themselves in his ways of life, is always a conquering force. A nation thrives by multiplication of such men; it weakens and dwarfs as their numbers diminish. The rule is not confined to individuals. It applies to communities as well as to men. A self-reliant, energetic, prosperous, contented community is a national force. Multiply this force, and the nation grows in strength, prosperity, contentment; and so long as these conditions exist its power will increase and its institutions endure.

Mr. President, a diffusion of industries will multiply such communities as will give us the results I have indicated, and this diffusion will transpire whenever the transportation shackles shall have been stricken from the willing limbs of communities now impatient of the restraints which hold them to inaction. They want to move, but they can not. They witness the processes of forced centralization going on, and feel and know that the vast concentration of capital, and work, and workers in the ponderous cities gives back no augury of encouragement to us to let this system go on unchallenged. I do not mean by this that we should so legislate that cities shall cease to grow; but I do mean that the practices of the transporting corporations whereby abnormal growth is forced upon a few cities at the expense of the equal rights of other communities shall cease by voluntary action or be reformed by law, and in saying this I look beyond the field covered by the material interests of those other communities as they may be affected by a diffusion of industries throughout the country, and into that even more intricate one where the action of political forces tends to resolve the weal or woe of this Republic. Nor do I make the suggestion in any sense from the standpoint of partisan consideration, but from that better view which takes in the public good, the general welfare and stability of our institutions, regardless of the effect which may fall to any party organization or association of men.

Every close student of public affairs in this country knows that the weak point in our political machinery is to be found in the great cities. We do not always find that jealous care in the political methods of great cities which is ever present in the smaller communities and rural localities. There is a vitality of vice which constitutes no inconsiderable political force in the former that rarely appears in the latter. But I have no purpose to pursue the discussion of this phase of the general subject here. It will be forced on our attention at no distant day, if this practice of forced centralization be allowed to go on unchecked, in a manner that will give us a clear definition of the saying, "Paris is France," and when we may have to undo something which we can now do much to prevent. And it is a cause of profound regret that the railroad companies, when the act of June 15, 1866, was passed, did not enter upon the new order of things which it both authorized and commanded with an intelligent fairness that would have compassed their own convenience and the unquestionable rights of the people both as respects communities and individuals. That great comfort, convenience, and expedition in the matter of the transportation of interstate commerce have resulted from that act is undisputed. But the act meant more than these results. It meant that persons and localities connected with the interstate commerce of the country should have equality of treatment; that transportation should be the servant and not the master of commerce; that such disadvantages as business might be under at any points or localities from natural causes should not be aggravated by hostile discriminations in transportation rates; that each locality, industry, and person should be entitled to and receive a fair proportion of the advantages that were expected to result from the improved transportation facilities authorized by said act, and that by these means and in these ways commercial communication among the several States should be facilitated. This was the public policy authorized and established by the act of Congress.

This, as I have already remarked, was a good start; and had the act been given its full and intended force, very little, if any, complaint would now be heard in all this country concerning the transportation of interstate commerce. Connecting by practice the duties and obligations of common carriers with the things which that act authorized the railroad companies to do, a realization of the natural and necessary results springing therefrom would have silenced almost every complaint that has been lodged against the corporations engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce. Nor would this have worked injustice or harm to the railroad companies. On the contrary, it would have established harmonious relations between them and the public, and have tended to augment rather than diminish the volume of business supplied to the carriers. It is one of the incomprehensible business blunders of our times that an opportunity so favorable to the true interests of the railroad companies was not seized upon by them and converted into a bond of amity between them and the public. It needed no surrender to unreasonable demands to accomplish this. A decent respect for the obligations imposed on them by the law relating to common carriers would have met the extremest exactions of the case so far as those elements of it which I am now discussing are concerned. The opportunity was neglected, and this was supplemented by a studied disregard of those obligations which can not be discharged by repeated violations.

The remonstrances which the public has opposed to this course can not successfully be dismissed by denouncing them as popular clamor. Nor will the earnest thought which is now focused on this subject be diverted by assertions that "natural laws and individual interests" will sooner right existing abuses than can be done by the enactment of statutes. I stated at the beginning of my remarks that whoever expects that a single act of Congress, however efficiently it may be executed, will eliminate from the transportation system the evils which have become parts of it will be disappointed, and our experience proves it. But no one will say that the laws already enacted and directed to that end have not done some good. The improved service which has been assured to the country is a complete justification of what has been done; but this does not compensate for, nor will it excuse, the abuses which have kept pace with it. While due credit will be given for the former, the latter will enforce agitation until a remedy shall have been provided.

The "natural-laws" theory that is advanced by the railroad companies as the unfailing remedy for all of the ills which have become fixed upon our interstate transportation system would do very well if the corporation doctors would allow their patient to take the medicine. But this is just what they will not do except as coercion, gentle or otherwise, is applied to overcome the idiosyncracies of a system which teaches one thing while it practices another. Natural laws tend to maintain the best conditions, no matter whether they relate to physics, morals, trade, commerce, or other fact or movement. Give free course to the natural laws about which so much is said in discussions relative to the subject of which the bill we are now considering treats, and I will agree that the relations existing between the public and its complex interests and the railroad companies would soon be resolved into movements of harmony and conditions of good-will. But this free course is not allowed to the natural laws in question, and, therefore, we have the agitation which demands that other laws shall be provided.

But the demand is not for enactments in contravention of the said natural laws. The demand made is reasonable, and its reasonableness consists in the fact that it only asks for such enactments as will enable commerce to enjoy the rights, freedom, and advantages which would be assured to it by the unobstructed action of said natural laws. It does not exact other and different conditions than those which the normal action of said natural laws would induce. The case is quite the opposite of that which the railroad companies present. Let them remove their arbitrary obstructions from the ways of commerce and allow it to move on the fair, just, and orderly lines of said specially pleaded natural laws, and the controversy will be at an end. Even the occupation of the demagogue who seizes upon popular discontent to serve his selfish purposes and to promote his personal and conscienceless ends will be gone. No one who possesses the slightest conservative tendency toward the practice of fair dealing has any desire to impose unjust terms, conditions, or laws on the railroad companies. Every well-informed man realizes and admits the great benefit they have been and now are to the country. No well-informed and honest man would for a moment entertain a proposition whose tendency would be to cripple the efficiency of the railway service. Every intelligent railway manager knows this to be true. And yet, in the face of this knowledge, the evil genius of arbitrary interference with the natural laws of commerce is allowed to have its way. This is the masterful spirit which has evoked the demand that now presses on this Senate and asks it to conserve the true interests of the country and its commerce by such just and conservative action as will restore the sway of those natural laws which are so often presented as a plea in bar to our progress in the direction indicated.

Mr. President, let us briefly examine this plea in the light of some of the evil practices that have become fixed in the administration of the transportation system of this country. What natural law of commercial action can be cited in justification of the arbitrary discriminations with which the transportation companies annoy, perplex, and punish localities, communities, investments, employments, and individuals in almost every department and division in their field of operations, or warrants them in their persistent efforts to destroy competition, and then because of failure to impose arbitrary rates for service rendered to the business of all non-competing points in order to make good the losses occasioned by the uncertain, whimsical, and unremunerative charges so often given to and from competing stations; to determine what places may engage in the manufacturing industries and which shall not; to encourage the investment of capital in some localities and to repress it in others; to say what towns or cities, other than the great commercial centers, may be selected by jobbers and wholesale merchants in which to pursue their business and to put all others under the ban of ruinous discriminations; to so discriminate between individuals engaged in like business in the same community as to enrich some and bankrupt others; to close the doors of opportunities against men of moderate fortunes, who otherwise would plant industries where real estate and food are cheap, and thereby furnish diversified employment to willing and waiting workers in multiplied localities, and only open those which lead to centers already overcrowded; to foster combinations in business and employments of capital in such manner as to suppress individual endeavor and repress the self-reliant trait in American character; to load down the railway lines of the country with burdens of fictitious securities and insist that no limitation shall be placed on the power to exact rates to any extent necessary to pay interest and dividends thereon; and to do whatever else may be suggested by pleasure, circumstance, or caprice of those who manage their affairs? All of these elements are present in the case, and in view of this fact I can but repeat the question, What natural law of commercial action can be cited in justification of these things?

Let us further test the real character of our transportation system by a more definite examination of some of its elements, taking as the first the one which involves the creation of fictitious securities. At the close of 1883 the total railway mileage in the United States was 120,552 miles. The cost thereof is represented by shares of capital stock issued amounting to $3,708,060,583, funded debts $3,455,040,383, floating or unfunded debts $332,370,345, representing a total cost of $7,495,471,311, or an average cost per mile of $62,176. And right here we have one of the most inexcusable features of our railway system, for it is safe to assume that the actual cash cost of the entire system did not exceed one-half of the nominal amount I have stated, and that the average per mile was but little, if any, more than $30,000. This feature of the case is remarked upon in Poor's Manual of Railroads for 1884 in this language, namely:

It is safe to assume that the new mileage constructed in the past three years cost about $30,000 to the mile, and that when our people build, say, 10,000 miles of line in one year, they expend upon them $300,000,000. In addition, a very large amount of fresh capital is yearly expended on old lines, so that we have for many years past been expending upon railroads considerably over $100,000 for every working day in the year. Should a large portion of the cost of new lines be lost the country is undoubtedly the richer by a corresponding amount from the incidental advantages they confer, the opening up of vast tracts for settlement, and in bringing within the reach of markets products which had before no commercial value.

There would be no danger of the loss suggested if the railroad lines of the country were limited in their financial burdens to the cost of construction, including equipment and all other expenditures necessary to their effective operation. It is not the real but the fictitious burden which cripples the roads and disturbs the business of the country. And were it not for this fact the railway securities of this country would be almost, if not quite, as stable in value as Government bonds. Treating of this view of the case, the author from whom I have just quoted says:

If it be assumed that the cost in money of all the roads in operation in the United States in 1883 did not exceed, as it certainly did not, the amount of their funded and floating debts, $3,787,410,728, the actual investment was a most profitable one. The net earnings for the year were $3,336,911,884, a sum equaling about 9 per cent. on their cost. If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success as investments would have no parallel. If to net income be added the advantages that flow from them, the result would be a matter of special wonder. Our railroads the past year transported over 400,000,000 tons of freight. At $25 per ton the value of this freight would equal $10,000,000,000. It is enough to say that, compared with the wealth of the country thirty years ago, they have created on this continent a new nation. While penetrating every portion of the continent, at least wherever our people go, they, for the first time, create the conditions of a firm and compact nationality.

Here we have a group of facts and opinions most suggestive. We see that if the railroad corporations had been held to the safe and conservative lines of the law relative to such artificial persons, this country would now be in possession of not only the most magnificent railway system in the world, but also the most prosperous, stable, and remunerative one. But, unfortunately, too many of the promoters of the system have been allowed to run riot over all sound provisions of the general law of corporations and of every correct principle of business economy. In many cases this ruinous course has had the sanction of public authority, while in others it has been pursued in direct violation of limitations imposed by law. And while it may be true that all of the abuses in the action of railroad corporations in the past may not now be remedied, it certainly is well for us to consider how far they can be corrected and how future repetitions of them may be prevented. It is not a pleasant fact for the people of this country to contemplate that our railway system is called on to pay dividends on capital stock and interest on funded and unfunded debt representing an amount twice as great as the cash cost of the roads. And while they may agree to all that the author quoted says relative to the great benefits which the country has derived through the railway system as it has been developed and now exists, still they will charge up to this feature of the account the burdens which rest upon the business of the country because of fictitious capital, which constantly cries aloud for interest and dividends.

It is not difficult for any man to see that too little money has gone into the treasuries of the companies to balance the amounts which the stock and bonds represent. And it is very generally understood that the law and public policy do not authorize the creation of such obligations except in return for a full equivalent paid into the treasury of the corporation in whose name they issue. If this rule had been observed every railroad company in the country that can present a reasonable excuse for having built a road at all could now earn a reasonable annual return on all of its cash capital invested by charging much less than the present average rates charged, and its bonds and stock would not need the gambling manipulations of the stock exchange to give them an appreciable value. It is true that by this conservative procedure there might not have been so many colossal private fortunes evolved as under the practice which has obtained; but the country would be in possession of a sound and satisfactory railway system in harmonious relations with the people and their business interests, and whose securities would rank with the best.

Leaving out of view the many cases of fraudulent stock issues representing no capital whatever, we need but direct our attention to some of the practices of the most solvent and conservative railroad companies to discover how fictions enlarge their aggregate of shares. It is no uncommon thing for such companies to capitalize expenditures for improvements, betterments, extensions, and other outlays of many kinds. Hundreds of millions of dollars earned in the ordinary course of business have been so capitalized and made a perpetual burden on the future earning capacity of the respective roads. In some cases I am informed that the capitalization of such expenditures as I have indicated amounts to nearly if not quite the original stock shares of the companies, and in about all cases to many duplications of the money which has gone from the holders to the treasuries of the companies. I am not inclined to impose a hard rule on the corporations relative to their earnings. I believe that the public will be content with such an adjustment of rates that the earnings therefrom shall be sufficient to pay operating expenses, interest, necessary improvements, and a reasonable dividend on the stock shares representing money or other valuable thing paid to the companies toward the construction of the roads.

But it is not right that any part of these earnings and expenditures shall be capitalized and stock shares issued therefor. This is money supplied by the public patronizing the roads. It does not come from the private funds of the owners of the roads. What rule of fairness and justice will allow such money to be turned into stock shares in order that the public supply the funds required to pay dividends on it? And how long can this process go on before even present solvent companies will break down under the ever-increasing weight which this process imposes? The rapidly changing conditions in our country and the rest of the world ought to be considered by the managers of our railway system. Instead of overloading their respective companies by the methods adverted to it should be their care to relieve them as opportunity offers. The very multiplication of roads should impress caution on them. While those who manage the trans-continental lines may well study the effect which the construction of ship-canals connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans may have upon the business of their roads, it is well that these considerations be not overlooked either by those who manage the railways or those who are charged with the powers and duties of legislation.

Mr. President, it is because I recognize the benefits which have come to this country through the railway system that I feel anxious to aid in effecting such reforms as will establish cordial relations between it and the people. The railroads have been of immense value to this nation. I quite agree with the general statement of the case as put by the writer from whom I have quoted, wherein he said:

It is enough to say that, compared with the wealth of the country thirty years ago, they have created on this continent a new nation. While penetrating every portion of the continent, at least wherever our people go, they, for the first time, create the conditions of a firm and compact nationality.

While this is true as a general statement, it nevertheless suggests some considerations tending to restrain the enthusiasm it is well calculated to evoke. When we put our minds earnestly to the subject we come to realize that our legislative authority, both State and national, has been less wise than the railway system has been absorbent and forceful. Had this not been so the abuses of which there is now so great complaint would never have grown to their present proportions. This is quite clear to our comprehension now. The public and the legislative minds were entranced by the beauties of the panorama of magnificent results as it unrolled itself during the greater number of those thirty years. If attention had not been so wholly given up to that absorbing contemplation we might have become possessed of all the beauties and results without the defects we now discover, and at much less cost. While the roads were penetrating every portion of the continent and creating the conditions of a firm and compact nationality their promoters and managers were, possibly with the best intentions, introducing methods and practices which have produced abnormal results now far from satisfactory to the greater portion of the country. One of these I have already noticed at some length, and that is the system of forcing everything possible to a few great centers. The entire power of the transportation companies has been bent to effecting this end. This was done by so adjusting rates as to force everything to the favored centers.

The centralization aimed at has been accomplished, and this is what renders the low rate on the long haul, of which so much discussion has been had, a necessity to the interior portions of the country. A mere declaration that the railroad companies shall not charge a greater rate for a shorter than they do for a longer haul will not cure the evil of forced centralization. The foundations of this structure have got to be sapped and mined by the adoption of a system of regulation that shall eradicate the entire nest of vipers of discrimination which now are used as aids to maintain the policy of centralization. While it remains the low rate on the long haul is the only door through which the West and far interior can reach the distant markets at the points of centralization. It is not the abolishment of the low rate on the long haul that is the immediate need of those great regions of our country lying distant from the dominant market centers. The thing most needed is a change of the system which keeps producers and consumers of both agricultural and manufactured products so far apart, forcing the greater volume of our interstate commerce to be transported over great distances, thereby rendering the low rate on the long haul a necessary element in the freight traffic of the country. The present conditions enforce an abuse of this very proper element of commercial movement by degrading it to the improper office of maintaining the present policy of centralization in opposition to one which would tend to diffuse the industries and employments of our people throughout all sections of the land.

But when we shall have changed existing conditions and established a system of commercial transportation more in harmony with the general welfare, experience will teach us that we will still have highly important use for the now abused practice of granting a low rate for the long haul. We can hardly expect that the time will come when the demand for domestic consumption will be equal to the entire volume of the productions of our people. Agriculture, manufacture, and mining will continue the present practice of producing more than we can consume. If we are to have no surplus in the future, why are we casting about for the discovery of methods for the revival of our ocean carrying trade? Do we expect the other nations of the world to so adjust their navigation laws as to put us in possession of their carrying trade? Do we expect England to foster the production of wheat in India, in order that our restored merchant marine may flourish by transporting it to the world's markets? These illusions are not in our minds. We anticipate an enlargement of the volume of our surplus, and expect to compete with other nations in disposing of it, and in order to do this successfully our products, of whatever kind, of the far interior must have the advantage of the low rate on the long haul to the seaboard. And so it will be, under the best conditions we can establish relative to a general diffusion of employments and industries, when commercial transportation must be made over long interior lines, it must have a corresponding advantage in rates; for this tends to a diffusion of values, and is not inimical to the widest distribution of industrial pursuits. The principle is a correct one. Let it be applied to its proper office and it will be promotive of the public good. Its abuse in our present system of commercial activity is the true cause of complaint. I shall be rejoiced when we reach the point from which we can take a new departure in this regard. But the difficulties which I see in the way constitute one of the reasons which led me to say that disappointment will come to any one who expects a single act of Congress to eliminate all of the evils that have become parts of our transportation system.

When we consider that the defects and abuses of the system which we now seek to reform have been developing and embedding themselves in it through the practically undisturbed progress of a period of about thirty years, we must not be too sanguine in our expectations in respect of their immediate elimination. Not merely the railroad corporations stand opposed, but all persons, associations, firms, communities, and interests participating in the profits and advantages resulting from the things complained of are ranged along with them. The great cities whose overtowering advantages and powers have been upbuilded on foundations laid of the evils and abuses of the general system; the communities whose successes in the main have come through arbitrary discriminations enforced against others; the associations which thrive on the effects of unequal rules imposed on their competitors; the firms whose prosperity is the fruit of transportation favors not accorded to others; the persons who revel in the luxury of rebates and drawbacks, will not be swift to see that a reform which proposes to enforce the principle of equality in respect of matters of commercial transportation is one of the supreme needs of the present juncture. But the change will come; for well-founded discontent with the present order of things is too prevalent and justly forceful to cease its efforts until a real reform shall be established.

I know how apt we are in this country to believe that anything, no matter how intricate or difficult it may be, can be accomplished at once and perfectly. But a moment of serious reflection will serve to convince us that this belief is not in accord with our experience. Great reforms have not been in the habit of appearing in full life and vigor at first command. They have been evolved rather than specially created. And it will be so, in greater or less degree, with the one we now have in mind. It will not be perfect from the start. But to be anything it must have a start. Having this it will grow, and ultimately develop into the form we desire. It may be best not to undertake to do too much at once. This consideration induces my support of the bill reported by the committee and now before the Senate. It certainly does not include all that I hope to have done. But as the act of June 15, 1866, was a good start in the matter of asserting the power of Congress to regulate the transportation of interstate commerce, so is the present bill a good beginning of the legislative action which will ultimate in a system of commercial regulation adapted to the right protection of all the varied interests to be affected, and, hence, promotive of the general welfare.

The provision of the bill which establishes a commission for the administration of the system proposed has my most hearty approval. With the aid of a competent commission a complete system of interstate commercial regulation can rapidly be developed, and in manner and form which will justly care for all of the complex interests to which it will apply. The amendments which I have proposed to the bill do not, as I have heretofore remarked, interfere with the structure or declaratory provisions of the measure, and I am content to have them incorporated in such manner and places as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], in charge of the bill, may prefer. I deem these amendments important to the ultimate perfection and success of the scheme presented by the bill, and, therefore, earnestly advise their adoption.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not rise to make any remarks except to say that when the bill is further proceeded with and before the amendments are voted upon I shall take occasion to indicate to the Senator from Iowa where I think his amendments ought to come in if they should be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill reported by the committee. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] offers several amendments to the text of the bill in the nature of perfecting the text, and the question is first upon the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that if he is prepared now to suggest the proper place for the amendments proposed by me, it may be well to do so at this time.

Mr. CULLOM. I will do so now if it is desired. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa I think should be added to the second section of the bill under consideration. The substance of it should be simply added to section 2.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I will state that I desire to submit to the Senate a few general remarks on the practical questions embraced in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I was aware that the Senator from New Jersey desired to speak, and hence I did not profess to suggest the place where the amendments should come in until after he had made his remarks.

Mr. SEWELL. I am ready to go on now.

Mr. CULLOM. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey, and will suggest the proper place for the amendments of the Senator from Iowa when the Senator from New Jersey shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, the bill under consideration aims at a national control of the railroad system of the country, so far as it pertains to interstate commerce. It proposes to establish a commission for the purpose of seeing that fair rates are made by railroads, and that the oplpee of the country are fairly treated by the corporations, giving the commission power to punish those companies that do not comply with what they consider just rates for transportation.

Many of the States have, in one way or another, legislated on this subject, and most of them have created commissions for the purpose of carrying out the acts of their Legislatures.

The transportation problem is one of great magnitude and one that has engaged the attention of some of the brightest minds in this country and in Europe. I think the time has fairly come now when it is the duty of the Government to take just such action as is proposed by this bill. While I do not think, myself, that there is any very great injustice being done by the transportation companies in general, there may be some isolated cases, and if this can not be reached by State laws it is but just and proper that Congress should provide a remedy.

It is but a few years since the first railroads were laid in this country. The growth for the last twenty-five years has simply been enormous. State after State has been gridironed, and we now have several lines across the continent. The railroad mileage of to-day amounts to 125,000 miles, costing over seven billions of dollars, the gross receipts amounting to $850,000,000 annually, and the profit to the owners to somewhat less than 5 per cent., although the stockholders have not received more than a fraction less than 3 per cent.

It is almost impossible to make a rigid law that could govern the transportation system of this country without in many cases doing great injustice by which some roads might be wiped out of existence and others benefited at their expense. The transportation of coal differs from that of grain, and grain from that of lumber, and lumber from that of cotton. The different sections of the country present different obstacles to overcome, in some cases, such as the passage of mountains, making it much more expensive than on the plains, and the severe winters of the northern section of our country making it much more costly than in the South; so that any law that would fix any rigid rule as to charge of transportation where there is such great difference in the cost would be manifestly unjust. Therefore, I think it is wise to leave to the discretion of the commissioners to be appointed under this act the determination of what are fair rates in the different sections of the country and under the different circumstances that the various lines are operated.

As I am in favor, therefore, of the bill as presented by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and which met the approval of the Railroad Committee of the Senate, I will pass from that to the discussion of the merits of the amendment as presented by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

That amendment proposes radical changes, among which are the prohibition of pooling, the charging more for a short than a long haul, and the prevention by law of the granting of drawbacks.

I understand the Senator from Mississippi to say that in his judgment one thing is absolutely essential to any effective legislation in restraint of unreasonable charges, and that is a prohibition against pooling, and that if competing railroad companies are allowed to pool their freights there can be no real competition or just fixing of reasonable rates. I understand the intention of the Senator from Mississippi to be to provide by some proper legislation for the carriage of interstate traffic at reasonable rates and at the same rates to all shippers for the same service. Both he and Mr. REAGAN contend that the great evil existing to-day and demanding prompt redress is the action of the railroad companies in carrying through freight below cost, and in then providing for the deficit thus caused in their earnings by taxing the local freight or that carried between points upon their roads where there is no competition. No one will deny that such a practice is deserving of severe reprehension if it exists, nor contend that the power of Congress can be more beneficently exerted than in redressing just such an evil.

The natural point of inquiry, therefore, is whether this end can be accomplished by the prohibition against pooling which the Senator from Mississippi suggests.

It may not be clear to all the members of the Senate just what is meant by the term pooling, and it may be well in the outset to get clearly in our minds that the mere act of pooling has necessarily nothing whatever to do with the fixing of rates. Pooling simply means that where two or more competitive lines carry traffic between the same points they agree between themselves as to what is the proper proportion for each line to carry; and when I say the proper proportion I mean the proportion which each line would naturally get by reason of the facilities which it furnishes to the shipper, either in the transportation of the traffic, or in the more or less favorable handling and delivery of it at the point of destination. There certainly can be no wrong done to anybody by two lines agreeing upon this point; it is done in all business, and works no injustice to any one. It gives to the enterprising railroad company, the one that has most largely invested its capital in furnishing a perfect road-bed, large warehouses for the receipt and storage of traffic, a full equipment and the other facilities necessary for its prompt transportation, a proper advantage over its competitor that has expended less capital, has inferior facilities, a longer route, and less favorable terminals, and therefore is not entitled to as large a proportion of the competitive traffic as its more active competitor.

It is in the interest of trade and the interest of all shippers that the railroads of the country shall be induced to expend their capital in furnishing just such facilities as these, and I am sure every one will agree that it would be a great mistake on the part of Congress or any other legislative body to interfere in the slightest degree with steps leading to that end. There is no practicable trouble in two or more competitive roads settling this question as between themselves, for the reason that their accounts show just the proportion of the traffic they have handled in the past between certain points, including periods when they were at peace and when they were at war with each other, but if the roads themselves can not agree any fair-minded third party can settle the question and give each road its proper percentage of the business. There is certainly nothing in this to prevent a just fixing of reasonable rates, and nothing which necessitates unreasonable charges. On the contrary it will, I think, be admitted by every one that if through this plan the railroads receive upon this through competitive traffic fair and reasonable rates, then the other object sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Mississippi—that is, the fixing of just and reasonable rates upon local traffic—becomes very easy to accomplish. It is useless to say that fair rates can be secured upon local traffic while the roads are allowed to compete for the through traffic at any or no rates, and allowed or compelled to carry it to destination below cost; and, therefore, any arrangement by which fair rates can be secured upon through traffic should, it seems to me, receive the sanction of Congress.

It must be borne in mind that the position of the railways in this country is entirely different from that in any other part of the world. In England, France, Germany, and all other countries than our own, no railroad can be built except by the direct sanction, in each individual case, of the legislative or executive authority, while under what is known as our free railroad laws any four or five men can associate themselves together, procure a charter, and build roads whenever and wherever they please. The natural result is, that not only are sufficient lines built to take care of the traffic, but that these lines are duplicated again and again until they are far ahead of the necessities of traffic, and until it is utterly impossible for them to earn a sufficient amount to begin to take care of the actual cost involved in their construction. This evil is aggravated, too, by the fact that through local aid from townships and counties it is made much easier for unnecessary roads to be built, as the constructors rely simply upon the profit made during construction, and having disposed of their securities have no further interest in the enterprise, while the damage caused by the construction of the unnecessary road is visited upon the local communities who have assumed heavy debts to aid a worthless undertaking, and on the other lines with which it becomes a direct and active competitor; for be it remembered that a railway differs from all other enterprises in this essential point: that once built it is practically there for all time; men can withdraw from other enterprises in which they have sunk their capital, and allow a mill or a warehouse to go to destruction, but a railway once built continues to be operated and remains a potent factor for good or evil throughout the entire territory which it traverses.

Not only this, but having been unnecessarily built, and being unable to get business from its longer established competitors at the same rates, yet being compelled to get money in some way to take care of its road-bed and track, its management cut rates in all directions, carry traffic below cost, and in that manner affect the earning power and the value of the securities of all the railways with which it comes into competition. As a natural result of this cut-throat policy it is placed in the hands of a receiver, and once there it practically becomes entirely irresponsible, for the judge of the court in whose custody it is has no practical knowledge of railroading and is compelled to rely entirely upon the officers who are running it. It makes no difference what it earns, for the receiver's certificates can be issued ad libitum and become a lien upon the property prior to its mortgages, so that to-day there is not a trunk line between the seaboard and the Mississippi whose business is not disastrously affected by the ruinous competition of railways which were utterly unnecessary to accommodate the traffic, and which now, in the hands of receivers, are carrying business below cost, and thus compelling solvent corporations to take it at the same ruinous figures.

It is not necessary, therefore, to assume that the railway companies resort to measures for mutual destruction because they are not allowed to combine in aggression against the public. The railway managers are, most of them, men of ability and experience, whose pride and interest it is that their properties shall justly and fairly accommodate the public and give to their owners a fair profit upon the capital invested. They do not desire wars to prevail, yet to-day and for nearly a year past the trunk lines between the East and the West, by reason of the acts of irresponsible and bankrupt corporations, have been utterly unable to secure a fair compensation for the transportation of traffic between the West and the seaboard, while the advantage of the low rates has accrued not to the producer but mainly to the middleman and the broker.

I do not believe there is any higher railroad authority upon this question of competition than Mr. Fink, the commissioner of the trunk lines, and his arguments before the committees of the House are so forcible and so much to the point as to present a very clear view of the whole question. Mr. Fink shows that it is absolutely impossible for the railways of this country to fix unreasonable rates upon the through traffic, by reason of the competition of the great lakes, the rivers, and the ocean; that the facilities furnished by the ocean steamers along the Atlantic coast to the Gulf of Mexico, and the railways stretching from the Southern ports to all parts of the South and Southwest, make it impossible for the railways to charge unreasonable and high rates upon competitive traffic to and from that section, while the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the great lakes on the north equally protect the interests of that portion of the Union. The moment a rate is made unreasonably high the farmer ceases to send by rail and ships by water, and the entire history of railroad transportation in this country shows a wonderful decrease in the rates upon traffic, both local and competitive. It is folly for gentlemen to preach about the railways oppressing the country by unreasonable charges, when the indisputable fact remains that the charges to-day are about one-half of what they were ten years ago and when the tonnage statistics show such a tremendous increase in the movement of freight by all railways from one end of the country to the other. I need only cite the experience of one railway, where the rate received per ton per mile decreased from 1.416 cents in 1873 to 8 mills in 1883, while its tonnage, moved one mile, increased from 1,384,831,970 to 2,996,892,567 in the same period.

Before the system of pooling was adopted it was utterly impossible to secure the same rate for the small as for the large shipper, and the great mercantile houses in the different cities sold their business to the railroad company that would carry it at the lowest rates, while the small houses were compelled to pay a materially higher rate to compensate the railroad companies for the reduced profit received from the large shipper. Agreements were continually made between the railroad companies by which a fair and reasonable rate was to be charged to all shippers alike, but they were no sooner made than violated, so that the man with small capital was at the mercy of his more wealthy rival, and in the end was ruined and driven out of the business. Now, the small shipper between competitive points, say New York and Chicago, is certainly equally as much entitled to protection against the large shipper between those points as the local shipper against the through shipper, and the only way in which this has ever been accomplished is by the railroads agreeing among themselves as to what percentage each is fairly entitled to, for the moment this is done it makes no difference to the railroad company whether it carries the goods of the large or small shipper if it gets a proper amount of tonnage and gets the same price for carrying it, whereas before the pooling system was adopted each railroad was competing with the other for the business of the large houses, and the small shippers paid high rates and the large shippers low rates.

This practice of pooling is one which is sanctioned by law in England,

Austria, and other foreign countries, and it is hardly fair or just to the railroad companies to condemn them in one breath because they can not maintain tariffs alike to all persons, and in the next prohibit them from adopting the only practicable method by which this end can be accomplished.

Under the great East and West pool of 1877 there has been a continuous and regular reduction in rates for a number of years.

The following statement from the report of Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jr., chief of the Bureau of Statistics, exhibits this fact:

The reduction in the average rates of transportation by lake and canal from 24.54 cents per bushel in 1868 to 6.60 cents per bushel in 1884, in the rates by lake and rail from 29 cents per bushel in 1868 to 9.3 cents per bushel in 1884, and in the "all-rail" rates from 42.6 cents per bushel in 1868 to 15.5 cents during the year 1884, was the direct result of the sharp competition which prevailed between competing railroads and between the railroads and the water line formed by the lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River. Each transportation line has exerted a regulating influence over every other transportation line, and this competition has strongly tended to reduce freight charges. It is probable that during this entire period the carrier has been able to realize only a narrow margin of profit.

It is not claimed nor do I believe that the reduction is in consequence of pooling, but it has been the means by which railway wars have to some extent been avoided, and the result has been improved economies and greater efficiency of the railroads and of more economical administration.

The general reduction of freight charges in the United States is also illustrated by the following table:

It appears from this table that the average annual freight charge on the trunk lines mentioned fell from 2.453 cents per ton per mile in 1868 to 1.803 cents per ton per mile in 1873, and further to 1.055 cents per ton per mile in 1883. This important reduction in the cost of internal transportation by rail in the United States has been the combined result of new economics, improved facilities, and competition. The rapidly increasing volume of traffic has also been one of the important elements in the reduction of freight charges.

It is worthy of note to observe the fact that the general fall of rates has effected a constant and rapid increase of traffic in the country. Quoting again from Mr. Nimmo's report:

The general results of the improved facilities for transportation which have been provided on the east and west trunk railroads, and of the competition between the railroads and the northern water lines, are also illustrated in the following table, which shows tonnage movements.

* From annual report of auditor of canal department, State of New York.
† From annual report of Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

From this table it appears that the tonnage transported on the New York State canals fell from 6,442,225 tons during the year 1868 to 5,664,056 tons in 1883, but that the tonnage transported on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad increased from 1,846,599 tons in 1868 to 10,892,440 tons in 1883; that the tonnage transported on the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad increased from 3,908,243 tons in 1868 to 13,610,623 tons in 1883; and that the tonnage transported on the Pennsylvania Railroad increased from 4,722,015 tons in 1868 to 21,674,160 tons in 1883. The total tonnage transported by rail on these three roads increased from 10,476,857 tons in 1868 to 46,177,223 tons in 1883. Perhaps no more striking illustration can be furnished of the enormous increase of the internal commerce of the United States by rail.

RAILROAD POOLING COMBINATIONS.

In this connection it appears proper to advert to the federation of railroads and other transportation lines by means of organizations having for their object the maintenance of rates established, and from time to time adjusted by common consent or by submission to the rulings of an executive head. Such agreements as to rates are generally enforced and rendered effective through agreements as to the division of traffic commonly known as pooling. Besides, some of these organizations have the function of determining the classification of freights and other matters pertaining to the conduct of traffic over connecting and competing lines. The present consideration of pooling organizations must be limited to their operations touching the transportation of grain, flour, provisions, and cotton to the seaboard. The determination of rates on grain, flour, and provisions from the West to the seaboard has been committed to the "joint executive committee" of the East and West trunk lines and their connections, embracing almost all the more important lines in the United States north of the Potomac and Ohio Rivers and east of the Mississippi River. The main office of this organization is at 346 Broadway, New York.

The Southern Railway and Steamship Association, which embraces the various lines extending from Atlantic seaports south of Cape Henry into the interior, and also the various steamer lines engaged in the coastwise trade between Northern and Southern ports, has the determination of the rates upon all cotton carried by those lines. The operations of this pool embrace the entire eastward movement of cotton by rail from Selma and Montgomery, Ala., and from all points east of the eastern boundary of the State of Alabama. Through affiliated lines it also exerts a competitive influence over cotton movements as far west as Memphis, Tenn. The main office of this organization is at Atlanta, Ga.

The "overland movement" of cotton is not controlled by any pooling agreement. The Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway, the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and the Chicago, Saint Louis and New Orleans Railroad have not entered into any pooling agreement. The cotton rates over these several lines are, from time to time, determined by agreement. The Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific and the Louisville and Nashville are parties to a pool at Selma, Ala.

The several lines west of the Mississippi River which are engaged in the transportation of cotton overland from Arkansas, Texas, and Northern Louisiana to Cairo and Saint Louis, and other points on the Mississippi River above Saint Louis, are all parts of the great Missouri Pacific Railway system.

Railroad companies in this country have united in pooling organizations mainly for the purpose of mutual protection against a competition which invariably ran into demoralization after repeated failures of mere agreements as to the maintenance of rates. It has also been found that pooling arrangements have had the effect of preventing secret rates to favored shippers, and of preventing those sudden and extreme fluctuation of rates which are demoralizing to trade.

The railroads have, through pooling operations, in important particulars, restrained competition; and, on the other hand, the extension of railroad lines has created competition between rival commercial centers, and this competition of trade forces has been found to be the paramount influence in the conduct of the internal commerce of the country. This is indicated by a quite general and marked reduction in rates.

The subject of the relations of railroad pooling operations to the public interest has for several years commanded the attention of Congress, in connection with the general discussion of the question as to the regulation of the railroads engaged in commerce among the States. This is a matter the practical administration of which would properly devolve upon a national railroad commission.

I concur generally in the views of Mr. Nimmo, who has given this subject great attention as to its results. I do not, however, at the same time, admit that pooling is necessarily a combination on rates. The latter often accompanies a pool, but pools are primarily for the protection of the different corporations for the amount of tonnage they receive.

The system of transportation that has presented such wonderful results can not have done very great injustice to the people of this country. There may be, and probably are, isolated cases where individuals and communities may have been injured, but they are few and far between. There has been as little wrong done in proportion to the magnitude of the business as has been done in any other sphere in life or business.

The Senator from Mississippi charges directly that half the capital of the united railroad corporations of this country (and there are about 2,000 companies) is water. Now, Mr. President, I deny that statement.

The present capitalized cost of the railroads of this country is at the rate of a little over $60,000 per mile. When you come to compare this with the cost of railroads in Europe, the lowest of any nation there being $100,000 per mile, increasing to $200,000 per mile in England, where money was to be had during the construction of the great lines at one-half the cost paid for it in the United States, it looks as though the capitalization of our railroads was not above their actual value.

For a number of years railroads were built by an actual cash subscribed capital, or sufficiently so to give them credit to mortgage their lines for part of their expenditure. It is only of late years that water has crept in.

Many of the States prohibited anything but cash subscriptions and the legitimate issuing of mortgages, generally to the extent of the amount of the subscribed capital. The great companies, in fact, large and small, in the Eastern and Middle States have been constructed on a solid cash basis. The process of watering has been applied more particularly to the lines going through the Territories, where special inducements had to be offered to the public in order to get the money to build them, but even in all of these cases there is no burden thereby placed on the shipper by the fact that there is water in the stock.

A number of these railroads were built on the bonds, and the stock, or a part of the stock, given to the subscriber for the bonds. It is well known which they are, and their stocks and bonds are quoted, not, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi would have us suppose, on the basis of paying dividends, but at a mere fractional percentage of their par value. It is not expected that they will pay dividends on a capitalization of this character, and few, if any, I think ever do. To offset the amount of increase of capitalization many of the older companies that have been in existence for a great many years have used their receipts for the bettering of their property without declaring dividends and without issuing a corresponding amount of stock to their owners. Occasionally the public will hear of an additional issue of stock by an old corporation to its stockholders and the press immediately charges that the stock is watered.

Now, it is the custom of fairly managed railroad corporations, that are earning dividends, to declare about half that they earn, accumulating the other and using it for extensions and betterments of their property; and, finally, they may determine, when they have accumulated 25 per cent. in this way, to issue that amount of stock to their stockholders. This, both in this country and in Europe, is considered perfectly legitimate. The amount of money has been earned and put into the additional plant, and it is no more than right that it should be represented in the hands of stockholders. This can not justly be called watering stock, so that I am of the opinion that the railroad system does not get the credit for a large amount of money that has been earned and spent for extensions and betterments of the different properties; but assuming that a part of what the honorable Senator from Mississippi charges is correct, even then (taking the dividends received last year from these properties) the stockholder has not obtained anything more than a fair, reasonable return for his investment.

The substitution of steel rails a few years ago was one principal means of cheapening railroad transportation. It came at a time when increased tonnage and a demand for lower rates were pressing upon the railroads of the country, and it looked as though (the renewals of iron rails were so frequently required) the corporations would become bankrupt, but a rapid substitution of steel reduced the current expenses to such an extent that the companies were saved, and rates of transportation constantly lessened.

The question of the difference between local and through rates, and the cost of doing both classes of business, has also occupied the attention of many of our ablest men. Local rates are fixed by law in the different States, but the railroad charges have gone so much below the authorized rates that there is no prospect now of the companies violating their charters in that direction. It is contended by some that the carrying of through freight at low rates, which sometimes is done at an apparent loss, is injurious to the local shipper, and that he is required in the end to pay a higher rate than if the companies were obliged to charge the same rate to all shippers. The reduction in rates, both through and local, that has been going on for years is a sufficient answer to this proposition.

The amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi does not seem to take into consideration the fact that a large part of the transportation of this country is done by water, and that a control that would leave out the water system might bankrupt all the railroads in the country. By reason of the fact that some corporations under this act would be interstate, and some of the largest would be only within one State and have the advantage of water connection that would not be governed by the act, the chances are that the latter corporations would bankrupt their rivals.

I wish to call the special attention of the Senate to the palpable injustice of tying up the American railways hand and foot, as against their competitor the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and as against the water routes of the country.

Under the provisions of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, the Grand Trunk of Canada is entirely free to make what rates it pleases and change them at will, and the natural result would be that the moment the American railways had fixed their rates the Grand Trunk would be able to cut under them and take from the American railways the business which they were built to accommodate, and take it over foreign roads to the seaboard entirely for the benefit of foreign capital. The Grand Trunk of Canada has been ever since it was built a most potent factor in destroying the through rates of the American railways and in bringing about the very evils of which the Senator from Mississippi so strongly complains; yet under this bill it is permitted and authorized to bring about the very state of facts against which the Senator from Mississippi protests, and is enabled either to take through competitive business from the American railways and compel them to rely upon their local traffic for their revenues, or to reduce their competitive rates to so low a point that they make no profit out of the carriage.

It certainly seems to me strange legislation for the Senate of the United States to be favoring foreign capital and foreign railways as against the roads built up through the enterprise and capital of the American people, and yet under the provisions of this bill the through traffic simply could be laden in vessels at Chicago, as was done before the Grand Trunk completed her rail line to Chicago, and sent to Sarnia or Windsor, in Canada, and from there taken by rail to points on the Canadian seaboard, entirely free of the operations of this bill, and at just such rates as might be necessary to take the traffic from the American railways. The Grand Trunk Railway is built on cheap capital furnished at a low rate of interest, has comparatively little local traffic, and is in a position where it is absolutely necessary for its existence to get a long haul on through traffic; and the result has been in the past that she goes into the market at Chicago and other points in the West that can be reached by water, and utterly demoralizes the through rates of the American railways and prevents them from getting fair and reasonable rates upon that traffic. There certainly can be no justice in this, and the argument advanced by the Senator from Mississippi that under the provisions of this bill the railroads would be compelled to exact a reasonable rate on their through business and thus be prevented from levying charges upon their local traffic falls utterly to the ground, because the railroads are left at the mercy of a competitor which has ample power to destroy through rates and compel them to carry at or below cost.

I need hardly refer further to the fact that under this amendment the water ways are left entirely free to change their rates at any moment of the day, and, as the most active competitors of the railways are the water routes all through the country, the railroads are practically put at their mercy, for while they are tied up under the bill for five days, the water routes have it in their power to reduce and vary their rates so as to take the business by cutting under the schedule fixed by the railways, no matter how reasonable it may be.

I have already adverted to the fact that through the great lakes and rivers this water competition is felt at every point upon the railway system of the country, and that the rates from Atlanta, Montgomery, Nashville, and all interior points are practically regulated as much by the water routes as the rates to and from Savannah, Charleston, Chicago, Toledo, and other ports situated directly upon the seacoast or the rivers; yet this amendment at one moment says to the railways, "We propose to stop your wars upon through traffic and compel you to get a fair rate upon that business, in order that you may not oppress your local business," and in the next breath it says, "We propose to prevent your getting a proper rate upon through traffic by leaving you at the mercy not only of your natural competitors, the water routes, but also of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, a foreign enterprise entirely free from the provisions of this bill, and able to destroy your through rates at its own will and pleasure."

I think it will puzzle any one to show the justice of such legislation as this.

Upon the provision of the bill that no greater charge shall be made for a short than for a long haul I do not propose to dwell at length, but I fail utterly to see the justice of the position taken by the Senator from Mississippi, that when a portion of a road has to be built through a tunnel or over a mountain, involving an enormous expenditure of money, the company should be prevented from making a higher charge for that section of the road, because, as he puts it, it is but a link in the chain, and it was nature that saw fit to put a mountain there and thus require an expensive tunnel or road through or over it. This reasoning would hardly apply to any other undertaking; and if the Senator from Mississippi had to build a turnpike road through a very difficult section of the country, he would hardly be consoled if he had to make the same low charge upon that section as upon a piece of perfectly level highway by being told that it was his misfortune that nature should have put obstacles in his way, and that his expensive piece of turnpike over a mountain was simply a link in his general system, and he could not be permitted to charge any more for it than for the comparatively inexpensive work in the valley. I doubt whether he would regard the subject in the same philosophical calmness if the rule were applied in that way.

But this amendment provides that a railway company shall be compelled to haul over, say, fifty miles of mountainous road, costing perhaps $5,000,000 to build, for the same sum of money that it charges over fifty or one hundred miles of road costing only $2,000,000. The mere statement of the case seems to me to show its absurdity, and I doubt whether any one familiar with the practical operations of railroads would for a moment contend for the justice of such a provision.

Under that section the railway companies that have built expensive lines in the coal regions of Pennsylvania and Maryland and into the mining regions of Nevada and Arizona would not be permitted to charge for a haul of fifty miles over such expensive sections any more than for a haul of fifty miles along the valley of the Susquehanna or Sacramento. If that section of the bill were to become a law it would simply place an embargo upon the development of the mining interests of this country and throttle the enterprise that has for thirty years past done so much to develop the rich mineral territory of the United States.

It seems hardly necessary to say that miles of railroad that cost in the case of the Hoosac Tunnel three millions a mile, and in case of some bridges over the Ohio and Mississippi one to ten millions per mile, can not be run and should not be required to be run at the same rate as a road costing fifteen to twenty thousand dollars per mile on an Illinois or Iowa prairie.

To show the difference in cost in operating different railroads, I present the following statement of the hauling power of locomotives on different grades, which shows the utter fallacy of fixing rigid rates of transportation over continuous lines which are often made up of several roads each operating under a different cost:

Grades.	Hauling power.	Loaded cars.
	Tons.
On a level	1,400	70
20 feet to the mile	655	32
40 feet to the mile	415	21
60 feet to the mile	300	15
80 feet to the mile	230	11
100 feet to the mile	180	9

In the Pennsylvania system it costs from 4 mills a ton per mile upon the most favored portions of the line to 6 cents a ton per mile upon some of its branches. On the Louisville and Nashville Railroad it is represented to cost 1.7 cents a ton per mile on the main stem, varying over different portions of the road until it reaches 19.10 cents a ton per mile on its Glasgow branch.

Mr. Fink, who is looked upon as one of the ablest men of this country in a railroad point of view, and who occupies a position which certainly gives him a thorough knowledge of the system and its requirements, and who would hear every complaint that would be likely to be made against the corporations, stated before a committee of Congress, within a short time, that there are no wrongs now which were unredressed, and that whenever complaint was made he investigated it and applied a remedy.

There will always, however, be a complaint of overcharge from individuals who do not have the benefit of water transportation or of the competition which water transportation brings about. Freight can be shipped from New York to New Orleans by water at a cheaper rate than the charge by rail to an interior point in Georgia. At the same time railroads compete for the coast-line business, charging more in this instance for a short haul than a long one; but if they were prohibited from doing so they would simply be obliged to give up the long haul, and it would not in any sense cheapen the rate for the short distance.

Believing, Mr. President, that the provisions of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, and also that offered by the Senator from Oregon, would be impracticable, injurious to the business interests of the country, and unjust to the railroads, I trust that the bill as offered by the Senator from Illinois will pass as reported by the committee.

The railroads of this country, as I understand them, are governed by intelligent men, who are required to-day to have the highest class of education in order to make them competent to fill the positions they hold, and they may certainly be said to be as conscientious in the discharge of their duties as any other class of gentlemen in the country. They are, to my knowledge, at all times ready to redress any grievance or wrong, and have no desire to burden the public unnecessarily, as the figures that I have presented will show in the constantly reduced cost of transportation. They are not averse to a fair supervision of their business by the Government; in fact, I think it would be a relief to them to have such a commission as is proposed by this bill. There is more of a necessity to-day for the protection of the railroad stock holder or of one corporation from another than there is ground for the general complaint, which is not made by business men or the actual shippers, that corporations are oppressing individuals and communities.

Nowhere else in the world is there such a system. In no other country is the traffic moved at so low a rate as in this, and it has not reached, in my opinion, the minimum yet. The amount of money expended in the past few years, which were fairly remunerative, in the improvement of the great railroads will constantly show a reduction in the cost of transportation; and with all that has been said against these companies as to pooling their traffic, charging more for short hauls than for long, watering their stock, and giving drawbacks to favorite individuals, the great result stands out in bold relief that within a few years the population of the country has been doubled, its traffic quadrupled, cities, towns, and States built up, a continent spanned in several places, and the balance of trade turned in our favor by the genius of these men of the rail, who have accomplished in the lessening of transportation charges that which the wildest granger never dreamed could be done fifteen years ago.

Is it well, Mr. President, to take any chances in a matter of this kind? Is it not well to make haste slowly? A system which has given us such extraordinary and magnificent results, which has built the country up and contributed more to its wealth than all else except the agriculturist, should not be experimented upon or hampered by any unwise legislation that could not be immediately changed.

Therefore, while I am in favor of a commission as proposed by the honorable Senator from Illinois, and of giving them ample powers to redress wrongs, I am opposed to the amendments offered by the honorable Senators from Mississippi and Oregon.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] if he will withdraw his amendments for a moment until I can offer one or two formal amendments. Then I will promise to renew them, or the substance of them, and will indicate the places in the bill where I think they should come in if adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws both of his proposed amendments?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; in order that the Senator from Illinois may submit an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer an amendment to the first section of the bill, which is merely striking out a few words. I move to amend section 1 by striking out, in lines 11 and 12, the words "beginning with the 1st day of July, anno Domini 1884." I ask to have those words stricken out, for the reason that the bill was introduced last year, and the year having passed they are of no account there. I ask a vote upon the amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend section 3 of the bill by inserting in line 5, after the words "freight of any description," the words "or for the receiving, delivery, storage, or handling of property."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I now call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to an amendment as embodying the substance of the first section of his amendment. I desire to state that the previous amendment offered by him, which was adding a section, is embodied in the second section almost verbatim. As the substance of the first section of the second amendment offered by him, I move to amend section 2 of the bill by adding after the words "within its power," at the close of the section, the following:

And to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to commerce between the States, and especially in the matter of the transportation thereof, so far as may be necessary to the establishment of a just system of regulations for the government of the same.

That amendment embodies all of his second amendment except the last clause; and the Senator from Iowa will find that that portion of his section is embodied in another part of the bill. I have no objection myself to the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I now desire on behalf of the Senator from Iowa to reoffer the substance of his main amendment, which I will offer as an addition to section 11. I am not prepared to say that I am for that amendment; but I offer it in his behalf and indicate that as the proper place where it should come into the bill if it is to be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 11 by adding the following:

And said commission shall accompany its first report with a bill presenting a just and comprehensive code for the regulation of the transportation of commerce among the States, which said bill shall embrace provisions for establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation and in the preparation of said bill, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very important amendment. I suppose it is in substance the amendment offered by my colleague. I am not clear that it is. I think we had better see it in the RECORD. Therefore I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before that is done I ask the Senator from Illinois if he has already offered the amendments he desires to have made and if they have been agreed to?

Mr. CULLOM. The amendments offered by me on behalf of the committee have been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not be well to have the bill printed as amended?

Mr. CULLOM. The amendments which have been offered are very slight and do not change the substance at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like very much to see the bill in print the way it is amended. A few words may make a very material change. I ask that the bill be printed as amended.

Mr. CULLOM. The last amendment offered was substantially the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and that has not been voted upon by the Senate. It has not become a part of the bill but was simply offered to be considered by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill as amended be printed, and let that amendment also be printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he wait until the consideration of the bill has progressed a little before we order a reprint. We have made but two small amendments; we have not changed the scope of the bill as yet.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose we shall be called upon to vote on the bill to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. Not to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Hardly to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I have no objection to deferring a reprint.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say on that point that I am very anxious that the bill shall be pressed forward to a vote as fast as may be with a view to its due consideration. I was in hopes, if no other gentleman desired to speak at length, that we should be able to get a vote on it to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was exactly the reason why I asked that the bill might be printed as it now is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri move that the bill be printed?

Mr. COCKRELL. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa I shall not make that motion.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to offer some verbal amendments which do not change the character of the bill, but are intended to confine it to interstate commerce. In section 2, line 5, after the word "commerce," I move to add "so far as they affect the same."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is in order at present except an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. One amendment is now pending.

Mr. SEWELL. I was not aware of that. I supposed that had been decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Iowa, I believe, moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion was not received by the Chair, as the Senator from Iowa yielded.

Mr. ALLISON. I now renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 5, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 24, 1884, was read and approved.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of John A. Swope, elected to serve as a Representative from Pennsylvania, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of William A. Duncan.

The SPEAKER. The certificate of election will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA, ss:

[SEAL.]

In the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Robert E. Pattison, governor of the said Commonwealth.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas in and by the forty-second section of an act of the General Assembly of this Commonwealth entitled "An act relating to the elections of this Commonwealth," approved the 2d day of July, in the year of our Lord 1839, it is provided that "when the returns of any special election for a member of the House of Representatives of the United States shall be received by the secretary of the Commonwealth, the governor shall declare by proclamation the name of the person elected;" and

Whereas the returns of a special election held in the nineteenth Congressional district of this Commonwealth, composed of the counties of York, Adams, and Cumberland, on Tuesday, the 23d day of December, A. D. 1884, under the authority of writs issued in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the above-recited act of the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, have been received by the secretary of this Commonwealth, whereby it appears that John A. Swope was duly elected to serve as a Representative of the people of this Commonwealth in the House of Representatives of the United States to fill the vacancy in the Forty-eighth Congress occasioned by the death of William A. Duncan: Now, therefore,

I, Robert E. Pattison, governor as aforesaid, do issue this my proclamation, hereby publishing and declaring that the said John A. Swope has been returned as duly elected in the district above mentioned as Representative of the people of this Commonwealth in the House of Representatives of the said Forty-eighth Congress of the United States, in room of the said William A. Duncan, deceased.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at Harrisburg, this 31st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1884, and of the Commonwealth the one hundred and ninth.

By the governor.

ROBERT E. PATTISON.

W. S. STENGER,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SWOPE appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

FALLS OF SAINT ANTHONY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers in regard to the condition of the Falls of Saint Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE TENDER LILY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board in regard to the burning of the light-house tender Lily, and asking an appropriation of $5,000 to pay losses of officers and men; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CASE OF H. KILBOURN VS. J. G. THOMPSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, inclosing accounts of stenographers for reporting the case of Hallet Kilbourn against John G. Thompson, and asking an appropriation for the payment thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LOCATION OF UNITED STATES PENITENTIARY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, inclosing letters from Mr. Robert Furman and Hon. John S. Langdon relative to the location of the United States penitentiary recommended by the Attorney-General in his annual report; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RANGE-LIGHT, KEY WEST, FLA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board, recommending the establishment of a small range-light at the northwest passage, Key West, Fla., and asking an appropriation of $200 therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers for the year ending June 30, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE AT POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect for an appropriation of $30,000 for the completion of a post-office at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, SANDY BAY, MASSACHUSETTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, inclosing reports, maps, and papers relating to the construction of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of claims allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury, amounting to $215,951.12, remaining unprovided for; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF WILLIAM BLAIR LORD.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House the Chair will lay before the House and ask to have printed a communication from the corps of Official Reporters of the House, transmitting resolutions adopted by them in relation to the death of their late associate, William Blair Lord. The Clerk will read the communication and accompanying resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit copy of resolutions adopted by the Official Reporters of debates on the death of their late associate, William Blair Lord.

I am, with high regard, your obedient servant,

J. J. MCELHONE,
Chief of Corps.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1885.

At a meeting of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates, held this day, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas William Blair Lord, who died December 21, 1884, at New York city, had served continuously and faithfully as one of the Official Reporters of debates of the House of Representatives since 1864, or for twenty years: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, his associates, place on record in the customary mode the expression of our deep sorrow at his loss and our appreciation of his personal integrity, his generous spirit, his professional skill, and his large knowledge of parliamentary law and of public affairs generally.

"Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be transmitted to the honorable the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the relatives of the deceased.

"D. W. BROWN.
"J. K. EDWARDS.
"JOHN H. WHITE.
"J. J. MCELHONE,
"Chief of Corps."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the communication just read will be printed.

There was no objection.

To Mr. LAIRD, indefinitely, on account of sickness.
To Mr. DUNN, indefinitely.
To Mr. BENNETT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MOULTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Committee on Claims papers of Jesse D. Durrell, there having been no report.

REPRINT OF HOUSE REPORTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

Mr. KING requests that a reprint of House reports 322 and 390, third session Forty-sixth Congress, be ordered.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

REFERENCE OF SENATE PENSION BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following:

Mr. MATSON asks that Senate pension bills now on the Speaker's table, for the relief of individuals, be taken therefrom and referred by the Speaker to appropriate committees.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this order will be made, and the Chair, at the proper time, will make the references.

There was no objection.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be printed with the amendments, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 452) granting a pension to Fredrick Corfe;
A bill (H. R. 2440) granting a pension to Usebus Sweet.
A bill (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris;
A bill (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Jacob Hoerth;
A bill (H. R. 3382) granting a pension to Albert Brant;
A bill (H. R. 4094) granting a pension to Henry Alden; and
A bill (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions.

CONGO CONFERENCE.

Mr. HERBERT presented the following resolution; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas it appears that the President of the United States has empowered Hon. John A. Kasson and General W. S. Sanford to represent this Government at what is styled the international African conference met at Berlin, in the Empire of Germany, to consider the question of erecting and maintaining a state in the basin of the river Congo, on the continent of Africa; and

Whereas such an alliance, as this conference seems to import, is a departure from the traditional policy of the Government of the United States, and the House of Representatives is without official information of the reasons which may have induced the President to accredit representatives to take part in such conference: Therefore

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the President be requested to inform this body, if not incompatible with the public interests, what were the reasons which impelled him to appoint delegates to represent the United States in said international African conference at Berlin. The President is further respectfully requested to inform the House whether in the letters of authority to said Kasson and Sanford, or otherwise, there were any conditions affixed to or limitations placed upon the exercise of their authority as such delegates; and if limitations and conditions were prescribed, whether such delegates made known to the conference the limitations of their authority, or whether they appeared unconditionally and apparently with full powers to act as delegates representing the United States in a conference assembled to discuss the question of erecting and maintaining a new state on the continent of Africa. And the President is further requested to impart to the House such information as may be in his possession tending to show whether the new state to be erected and maintained by the powers taking part in the conference is to be republican or monarchical in form. The President is also respectfully requested to give his opinion as to whether the appearance of delegates from the United States in such an international conference would not estop the Government to deny the rightfulness of any future alliance European sovereigns might make to set up on the American continent governments of such form as to them might seem wise whenever an occasion for such interference might arise.

ETHAN A. AND EDWARD V. DEUELL.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 7793) for the relief of Ethan A. and Edward V. Deuell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAND introduced a bill (H. R. 7856) for the relief of Mercy A. Cole; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I understand that we have now reached the order of motions to suspend the rules, and I desire to call up under that order the unfinished business coming over from the last session. At the time of the adjournment of the last session a Senate bill providing for the erection of a public building at Carson City, Nev., was pending on a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. I inquire whether that is not the order of business at this time, this being the first day this session for individual motions to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Was the bill presented to the House and read and had the House proceeded to consider it?

Mr. CASSIDY. We had voted upon it; and the point of "no quorum" had been made. We were attempting to develop a quorum when the hammer fell at the expiration of the session.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is in order now as unfinished business. Was a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. CASSIDY. The demand for a second had been waived. Discussion on the bill had taken place, and we had got so far along as to vote upon the bill. The point having been made that no quorum had voted, tellers had been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question then is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY], just before the adjournment of the House in July last, to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, what order of business is it that comes up now?

The SPEAKER. Suspension of the rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe the first business of that character now in order is the motion made by me on the last day when this order of business was before the House. That motion is still pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], on the first Monday in July, the last day of the last session for individual motions to suspend the rules, was recognized by the Chair, rose in his place, and stated that he moved to suspend the rules and pass some bill, which he sent to the Clerk's desk.

It was not read, but a motion was immediately made to adjourn, which was adopted by the House. Therefore under the rules of the House that motion was not yet in possession of the House for consideration. Later in the session, when the present occupant of the chair was absent, the then occupant of the chair recognized the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY], who moved to suspend the rules, as is shown by the official record, and pass a certain bill, which was read and upon which the vote was attempted to be taken. So the House was in possession of that bill, and the Chair thinks it is obliged to complete the consideration of that motion, under the circumstances, before going to any other business.

Mr. HISCOCK. The bill on which I moved to suspend the rules and pass it was sent up to the Clerk's desk, and is now in possession of the Clerk, and has remained in the possession of the Clerk ever since.

The SPEAKER. It was not read, nor was the proposition made by the gentleman stated by the Chair. The Clerk will read the second subdivision of Rule XVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will see the bill which he sent up was not read and was not therefore in possession of the House to be considered by the House, whereas the bill——

Mr. HISCOCK. But I had made my motion.

The SPEAKER. But the motion was not before the House until it had either been stated by the Chair or put to the House, and the House determined it would not have it presented, and adjourned, cutting the gentleman off. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HISCOCK. But suppose the motion to adjourn had failed, would not the question have recurred on my motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's bill would then have been read and before the House for consideration. The Chair thinks the House can not have two matters of this sort under consideration at the same time. It is perfectly clear the proposition offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] was in possession of the House and that the House was voting on it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Am I to understand that my motion comes in next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from New York and will recognize him next, as the gentleman had the floor. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

PUBLIC BUILDING, CARSON CITY, NEV.

Mr. CASSIDY. I now ask for a vote on my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada, a suitable building, with a fire-proof vault, for the accommodation of the United States courts, the post-office, and other Government offices in said city, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys; the site, and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $100,000: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be available until a valid title to the site selected is vested in the United States, nor until the State of Nevada shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. CASSIDY. That was waived by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REPEAL OF INTERNAL TAXES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now ask to submit my motion to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which is in possession of the Clerk to repeal all laws imposing internal taxes on tobacco.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal the laws imposing internal-revenue taxes upon tobacco, and to authorize the withdrawal of alcohol and distilled spirits, and all products of distillation containing alcohol and distilled spirits, from bond without the payment of the internal-revenue tax, for use, except for use as a beverage, and for other purposes; and to repeal the internal-revenue taxes on liquors distilled wholly from apples, peaches, grapes, and all fruits.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1885, the taxes herein specified imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States now in force be, and the same are hereby, repealed, namely: The taxes on manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes, and the special taxes required by law to be paid by dealers in leaf-tobacco, retail dealers in leaf-tobacco, dealers in manufactured tobacco, peddlers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and manufacturers of snuff and of cigars: Provided, That on all original and unbroken factory packages of smoking and manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes held by manufacturers, factors, jobbers, or dealers at the time such repeal shall go into effect, upon which the tax has been paid, there shall be a drawback or rebate in favor of said manufacturer, factor, jobber, dealer, or other owner of said tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes, to the full amount and extent of the tax so paid thereon, but the same shall not apply in any case where the claim has not been presented within ninety days following the date when such repeal shall take effect; and no claim shall be allowed for a less amount than $10, and any special-tax stamp covering taxes repealed by this act may be redeemed for the portion of the special-tax year unexpired at the time of the repeal when the amount claimed for such stamp shall not be less than $10; and all sums required to satisfy claims under this act shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt such rules and regulations and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

SEC. 2. That all internal-revenue laws limiting, restricting, or regulating the manufacture, sale, or exportation of tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes are hereby repealed on and after the 1st day of July, 1885, and that there shall be no drawback allowed upon any such articles which shall be entered for export on or after that date: Provided, That all laws now in force shall remain and have full force and effect in respect to all offenses committed, liabilities incurred, or rights accruing or accrued prior to the date when the repeal of the taxes specified in this act shall take effect.

SEC. 3. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1885, all laws and parts of laws heretofore passed by Congress and now in existence imposing an internal-revenue tax upon liquors wholly distilled from apples, peaches, grapes, and other fruits shall be repealed.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules, regulations, and restrictions as he may from time to time make for the withdrawals hereinafter provided for, and for their use, manner, and place of use, is hereby authorized to grant permits to any individual, copartnership, or corporation to withdraw from bond, without the payment of the internal-revenue tax thereon, distilled spirits, alcohol, and all products of distillation containing distilled spirits or alcohol, and subject to an internal-revenue tax, in specified quantities for use, provided the same shall not be so withdrawn for use as a beverage or for the manufacture of any product thereof for use as a beverage, or admixture of the same, or any product thereof, with any other substance or product for such use: And provided further, That the applications for the aforesaid withdrawals shall state respectively where and for what purpose and in what manner the distilled spirits, alcohol, or product of distillation aforesaid is to be used for which the application for withdrawal is made: And provided further, That upon each withdrawal under this act the individual, copartnership, or corporation making the same shall execute and file a bond with two good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by a collector of internal revenue or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a penalty for double the amount of the tax on the quantity of distilled spirits, alcohol, or product of distillation aforesaid stated in the application for withdrawal thereof, conditioned that the same shall only be used at the place, for the purpose, and in the manner stated in said application, and that all rules, regulations, and restrictions made by the Secretary of the Treasury for the use thereof shall be observed and complied with, and for a breach or violation of any condition of such bond the United States may recover the full penalty thereof: And provided further, That any person who shall sell, use, or knowingly permit the use of the distilled spirits, alcohol, or product of distillation aforesaid withdrawn under this act, or any product thereof in any quantity whatever, for any other purpose than that specified in the application for the withdrawal of the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense, upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned not less than ninety days, and pay a fine of not less than $100: And provided further, That the Secretary, in the rules, regulations, and restrictions which he may make, in his discretion may require the admixture of the distilled spirits, alcohol, or product of distillation withdrawn under this act to be mixed with methyl or wood alcohol of equal proof strength, and in such quantities and under such regulations as he shall approve.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill just read.

Mr. MILLS. On that I demand a second.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that where the date in this bill is July 1, 1884, it be modified to read "July 1, 1885."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to do that, as the bill was never presented to the House until this morning, and of course he has a right to place it in such form as he may desire.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I ask to make that change in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a second on the motion.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let it be considered as ordered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then appoint tellers.

Mr. MILLS and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 75.

So the second was ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose I have the last fifteen minutes, and will therefore hear from the other side.

Mr. MILLS. That, as I understand it, is contrary to the custom. The gentleman has the affirmative of the proposition, and according to the practice of the rule has a right to open and close the debate.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am entirely willing to occupy the fifteen minutes after the other side has concluded.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from New York will take at least a portion of his time now, since we have not been able to get this bill, and I, for one, should like to have some explanation of its provisions.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will occupy, then, five minutes of the time now, and ask to be notified by the Chair when I have consumed that much time, reserving the remainder until after the other side has been heard from.

I shall attempt only in this brief time to state the objects of the bill. First, it repeals all of the internal-revenue taxes upon tobacco; second, it repeals the internal-revenue taxes upon distilled spirits so far as they are used and consumed in the manufacturing, mechanical, and industrial arts; and, third, it repeals the internal-revenue tax upon brandies distilled from fruits. These are the three essential features of the bill.

In my judgment the adoption of this measure will decrease the revenues of the Government nearly or quite $40,000,000, and I believe it will be a good thing to have the revenues reduced to that extent.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would be glad if the gentleman from New York would state his estimate of the reduction in the revenues from the repeal of the tax on spirits used in manufacturing and mechanical arts.

Mr. HISCOCK. The best and most careful estimate that I have seen, and one that I regard as reliable, is that it will amount to from seven to ten millions of dollars reduction. I believe my colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] once said upon the floor of the House that the internal-revenue tax upon alcohol was a tax upon the manufacturing industries of this country to the amount of nearly $10,000,000, in his judgment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Where, then, do you get the reduction of fifty millions?

Mr. HISCOCK. From the other features of the bill. The amount to be taken from tobacco will be from twenty-five to twenty-seven million dollars, and somewhere from three to seven millions of dollars by the repeal of the taxes upon brandies distilled from fruits.

I now reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MILLS. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the intent of this bill is to so largely reduce the revenue that there will be no surplus, and thereby greatly remove the danger of legislative interference with certain interests which are robbing the people of this country. It means to protect the salt interests of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], the mover of this proposition, that are robbing the people of the country of over a million of dollars annually on this important necessary of life, besides the incidental increase on the product here. It means to protect the sugar rings of Louisiana, where $46,000,000 are wrung from the people. And so you may go on through the list and figure out the industries that are protected. It means to take the righteous revenue from whisky and tobacco so as to have no surplus from which you can make a cut in the interest of tariff reform.

You have done nothing on the tariff question; you can at least avoid a stupendous blunder of this kind; or if you want to go before the people leaving to this Congress a hated memory as an infragrance in their nostrils for all time, take the taxes off whisky and tobacco and leave untouched your enormous duties on the absolute necessaries of life. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] for three minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allowed to me I desire to say to the House that the passage of this bill, if it should pass with the free-brandy clause in it, would operate for the destruction of the entire tax on distilled spirits. We now realize every year between seventy and eighty million dollars from the production of distilled spirits, and if you allow brandy or whisky to be distilled from fruit free of taxes, all that we now consume of distilled spirits in this country will be immediately manufactured from these commodities, and the entire revenue now raised from this source will be lost.

Not only that, but immediately upon the passage of this bill it will operate as a confiscation of 80,000,000 gallons of goods now in the hands of the dealers and the makers. And not only that, but after that time it operates as a confiscation of every dollar of invested capital that has been made by the distillers in this country, except those possibly at Baltimore and in some other cities, where, by procuring fruits from abroad from every direction free of tax, they can manufacture sufficient to supply the whole country.

So far as the tobacco tax is concerned, we all understand that if you repeal the tobacco tax now we will lose a revenue of nearly $25,000,000 per annum—a tax, too, which is unfelt by the consumer. We have had experience with it in the last five years. We reduced the tax from 16 to 8 cents a pound, and we have not reduced the price of tobacco or cigars a single cent to the consumer. It is just as high to-day as it was then. Nor has a high tax cut off the profit of the men who raised the product. On the contrary, tobacco is higher, as the statistics show. In New York, Kentucky leaf tobacco has ruled higher under a high tax than under a low one.

No man is interested in taking this tax off either tobacco or distilled spirits. If we were to take the crude law which the gentleman from New York has brought to us and pass it under a suspension of the rules, the effect would be to take off the best tax that can be levied, because it is a voluntary tax paid by vicious consumption, while you still leave the taxation on the necessaries of life.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] estimates that the reduction of the revenues under the proposition contained in the bill will amount to $50,000,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I change that estimate, and will say $40,000,000, so as to be within the mark.

Mr. BLOUNT. And now the gentleman changes the estimate and says the reduction will be $40,000,000, and so we are asked to progress in this conjectural way about the revenues of the country in regard to which there ought to be so much care.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] proposes to this House that on these simple conjectures we shall take up a great measure like this and pass it through this House. He tells you that the amount of revenue received from brandy distilled from fruit at this time is about $3,000,000, while the Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells you that the receipts are $1,023,000. The Commissioner gives you the receipts from spirits distilled from grain and other materials from which this bill removes the tax as $70,000,000; the gentleman from New York guesses that the reduction will be $10,000,000. The receipts from tobacco are $26,000,000; about what the gentleman has stated.

Now, sir, this bill comes here without any recommendation from any committee. It comes here under circumstances that prevent debate. It comes here under circumstances that prevent the best judgment of this House from accommodating itself to right conclusions by amending it wherever it is objectionable, I submit, sir, that the principles of wise legislation forbid any such proceeding.

Some of the measures contained in the bill I should be glad to support. The fruit-brandy tax I should be very glad to see repealed; other gentlemen differ with me about it. The tobacco tax taken in connection with other subjects I should be glad to see disposed of. The tax on whisky the gentleman from New York proposes shall remain, except where it is used for manufacturing purposes and in the arts, leaving all the vicious machinery connected with that tax.

Now, sir, I think when we undertake to reduce taxes we ought to consider the question of reducing taxation on the clothing, farming implements, and other articles used by men, women, and children as necessaries, rather than commence by reducing the price of intoxicating drinks; and further, I am quite sure that one of the prime causes of objection to the internal taxes grows out of the machinery itself, all of which is permitted to remain under the provisions of this bill.

I trust, therefore, sir, that we shall not adopt a measure of this character in this way. Our revenues from customs are falling off and our public debt is increasing. All of these questions deserve the careful consideration of this House. I do not believe that the country is expecting that at this session of Congress we should take up the question of the mode of raising revenue, either the tariff or the internal taxes. The feeling is that so far as this Congress is concerned those matters belong to the things of the past, and I trust they will go over until a new Congress shall assemble under circumstances where they can be carefully and wisely considered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like another half-minute.

Mr. MILLS. I yield another half-minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I only add that in the light of recent events in November, since there is to be a new administration of affairs and a new policy to be adopted in this Government, I trust that gentlemen on this side will not make great haste to anticipate the action of another administration.

Mr. MILLS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me by the gentleman and enlarged by the House I desire briefly to state my reasons for voting against this bill. This bill we know now can not become a law. It requires a two-thirds vote. The vote upon the seconding of the motion just taken discloses a meager majority in its favor. When the yea-and-nay vote is taken it will, instead of the necessary two-thirds vote, hardly receive one-third. No practical result will follow, and no good, but only harm, will come from this effort.

This is an unusual, I may say an extraordinary, proceeding. In the closing hours of this Congress it is proposed to pass a bill which will revolutionize our whole system of taxation, both internal and external; a bill which brings into one hotch-potch a number of subjects which have no affinity either direct or remote; a bill which, without the indorsement of any one of our numerous committees or of a single Department of the Government, proposes at a single dash to withhold untold millions from the public Treasury. No one, not even the gentleman introducing it [Mr. HISCOCK], has been able to state the amount involved in its passage.

Not only are we to be led thus blindly without facts or figures from any source, but we are asked to pass this important bill without a word of debate or a single opportunity for amendment. It is a most vicious and inexcusable way to deal with great questions. Not a member here in the hurried reading of the Clerk can state the full effect or meaning of this legislation. The subjects are too important to be passed upon in this hasty and extraordinary manner.

What change has come over the spirit or spirits of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], the able leader of the Republican side of this House, that he should ask Democrats to follow him without knowing where he leads? Only a few months ago, when time and full debate could be given, he was unwilling even to consider this and kindred subjects. Then it seemed he wanted no change of these laws. The surplus in the Treasury did not disturb him then. He refused by his vote to give it a single hour of thought. Having refused a careful and systematic examination of the whole subject of Federal taxation, he brings in two or three of the thousands of articles demanding investigation and asks legislation upon their status without reference to the effect it may have upon the others. Is this wise and prudent legislation? Is this to restore confidence and business prosperity? Has the gentleman commended himself to this House as a friend of revenue reform that he should expect us to desert our own chosen leaders and follow him? Knowing as I well do the position of that gentleman upon all of these questions in the past, I must claim the privilege of looking with great distrust upon his proffered relief. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

Since this bill has been up under the thirty minutes' discussion allowed by the rules I have endeavored to ascertain its contents, but with imperfect success. A part of it is the substance if not the exact words of a bill which I have had the honor to introduce in several Congresses, making alcohol free of tax for use in the arts and manufactures. In three successive Congresses I have urged the passage of that bill. I am heartily in favor of it to-day. If it came before this House as a separate measure I believe it would promptly secure not only a majority but the two-thirds vote necessary to suspend the rules and pass it. I regret that the gentleman has jeopardized a good measure with another proposition which, as I shall presently show, is dangerous, unjust, and indefensible. There are quite a number of gentlemen who will vote for free alcohol in the arts who have already refused their assent to the triple or quadruple proposition embodied in the pending bill. I have at considerable length heretofore given my reasons for supporting a bill for free alcohol in the arts. I shall be glad to do so again when the question comes up, not, as in this instance, as a mere theoretical expression of opinion, which some people may suspect is intended only for political capital, but as a matter of practical, hopeful legislation.

The abolition of the tobacco tax is another important question which deserves and ought to receive the most careful and considerate attention of this House. It is true the present tax is only 8 cents a pound, and if it were determined by the Government that it should always remain it would be, as I understand, entirely satisfactory both to the consumer and manufacturer. The tax is now so small that its entire abolition would not make much if any difference in the price to the consumer. It is, however, upon the manufacturer that the existing tax bears most heavily, and this not because of its amount, but because of the frequent agitation of the question by Congress. The periodical introduction of bills changing the amount or proposing to abolish the tax demoralizes the market and puts it in the power of large and wealthy manufacturers by a system of guarantees to secure a monopoly of the market. For this reason my purpose has been for several months as a choice of evils to vote to abolish the tax.

This result could perhaps have been accomplished to-day if this question alone had been embraced in this bill. The amount involved could be correctly ascertained, as the last reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue give it exactly—$26,062,399. The Secretary of the Treasury states that the surplus for the coming year would be a larger sum than this, so that the abolition of the tax on alcohol used in the arts and the abolition of the tax on tobacco could, even in this unusual way, have been secured without going beyond safe limits as to the income of the next fiscal year. Had this bill been confined to these two subjects, both important, both deserving fuller consideration, but yet both sufficiently familiar to authorize our action upon them, it would have met with my hearty support.

It goes, however, much further than this. It asks us to make fruit brandies free—to withdraw all Governmental inspection and regulation over them. This proposition I regard as unwise, unjust, and unnecessary. It would be in my judgment the source of the greatest frauds upon the Government. It would induce thousands of men to go into the business because of the invitation and opportunity for imposition which it would furnish. Practically it would be the overthrow of the whole internal-revenue system. I do not believe that the interests of the country demand such a result. I am unalterably opposed to the abolition of the tax on whisky. If this bill passes there will be no more "whisky" manufactured. It will all be "grape brandy." The temptation of 90 cents per gallon would tempt even a "moonshiner" to desert his chosen vocation and to believe that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. I am opposed to doing by indirection what I am unwilling to do directly. Moreover, the passage of such a bill would mean bankruptcy and ruin to a large number of my constituents, who under existing law have honestly manufactured and paid tax upon an article whose value would thereby be enormously reduced.

I waive here all question as to the intention of this part of the bill with reference to the continuance of our present high and unequal tariff duties. The excise tax is provided for by the Constitution; and so far as this part of the whisky tax is concerned, it meets to-day with the approval of nineteen-twentieths of our population. As to the complaints of our "moonshiner" friends which have so recently touched a tender chord in the bosom of our high-protection advocates, it may not be improper to suggest that in the next four years, under a Democratic administration, we hope and expect to have officers identified with the communities in which they live, who, while executing the law, will be careful themselves not to violate law. Better promise than this no honest man could ask for.

Thus hurriedly, Mr. Speaker, and very unsatisfactorily I have stated my position upon these propositions and given some of the reasons why I can not support this bill as a whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has three minutes and a half remaining.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, this appears to me a very extraordinary bill to be brought into the House to be passed at this time under a suspension of the rules. The last two of the reports made to the country by the Secretary of the Treasury show that the public debt is on the increase. We all know that the amount of our interest-bearing debt now due is about $190,000,000 or $200,000,000, and it ought to be paid as soon as possible. Yet with the public debt now pressing upon the people, and requiring some $50,000,000 annually to meet the interest, the House of Representatives is employing itself to give away the revenue of the Government. And for what purpose? To stop paying the debt. And for what purpose? To perpetuate the debt as the basis upon which the national banks shall exist, and to perpetuate a system of high tariff protection. That is the whole theory of all this system of legislation.

Why, sir, as soon as the war was over and it was demonstrated that large revenues were coming into the Treasury sufficient to pay off all this debt in a few years, Congress commenced then, under the leadership of my distinguished and venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], to reduce the revenues by propositions passed under suspension of the rules. But from whose shoulders was this burden of taxation removed? Was it from the shoulders of the vast body of the people of the United States who have to consume $600,000,000 of the products of iron and steel to maintain their daily existence? Was it from the shoulders of the vast body of our people who require woolen clothing in winter and cotton clothing in summer? No, sir. From whose shoulders was this great burden of taxation taken in this hurried manner by the Congress of the United States? It was taken from the shoulders of 450,000 persons, among others, who had an annual income of $800,000,000 and who paid into the Treasury taxes on that income amounting to $72,000,000. That taxation was so burdensome, so odious, so inquisitorial in its nature, so oppressive upon those who had it to pay, that Congress removed the burden to satisfy the demand of those few but powerful people, and left the whole crushing weight of taxation upon the necessaries of life still pressing upon the shoulders of the laboring population of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. TUCKER. I yield a portion of my time to my colleague [Mr. CABELL].

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill I am in favor of its passage, for the reason that it will be a great relief to the industrial interests of the country. Gentlemen charge that this is a movement in the interest of tariff protection. I do not stand here to advocate it as a protectionist—I am not that; but I advocate it because it will lessen the burdens upon the people and because it will relieve a large section of our country from an infamous system which has brought distress and calamity upon it for years. Not only is the system itself a bad one, but the method of its execution in many places is a reproach to the Government as well as an outrage upon the people.

I am especially in favor of the passage of this bill because it removes entirely the tax from tobacco, the only agricultural product upon which a tax now remains. It was said years ago that as soon as the emergency which called this system into existence should pass the people would be relieved of this onerous and inquisitorial species of taxation. Surely enough time has elapsed and the gains to the Government have been sufficient to justify the repeal of the law at the present session of Congress. The passage of this bill will not deprive the Government of the amount of revenue which gentlemen have stated. The remission of the tax upon tobacco proposed by this bill will not amount to over $23,000,000. That upon alcoholic spirits used in the mechanic arts will not exceed six or eight million dollars, and the abolition of the tax upon liquors distilled from fruits will not exceed, if it will equal, $1,800,000; so that the entire reduction of revenue to be accomplished by the measure will be some thirty-five or thirty-six million dollars at the outside. In view of all the circumstances can not the Government afford to submit to such reduction of its revenues?

Gentlemen profess great regard for the agriculturists and the agricultural interests of the country. Is it not time to make good those professions by repealing every law which lays a burden upon the farmer or his products?

I speak not only of tobacco, but is it not time that the poor men in the mountains of several of the Southern and Western States should be allowed to utilize their fruits by distilling them and putting them into such shape as that the product can be marketed and the proceeds devoted to the sustenance of these toilers and their families rather than to the doubtful requirements of an overflowing Treasury? The amount realized from the tax on liquors distilled from fruits does not at all compensate the Government for the cost of collection and the maintenance of a system so liable to abuse and so distasteful to the people.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that it will be the pleasure of this House, after the continuance of this system of taxation for so many years, to give relief to the great interests involved by the prompt passage of this bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons, and a principal one, for the passage of this bill is that it will reduce the surplus in the Treasury. That surplus has been for years past, and will be for years to come, a wrong to the people, from whom the Government should take no more than it needs for an economical administration.

The revenue from customs was last year about $195,000,000, from miscellaneous sources about $30,000,000, and from internal taxation about $121,000,000; in all about $348,000,000.

The expenditures were: for pensions about $55,000,000, for interest on public debt about $55,000,000, for other ordinary expenses about $135,000,000, and for the sinking fund about $46,000,000; in all about $290,000,000; leaving a surplus of about $58,000,000 of the people's money to lie idle in the Treasury.

It is thus seen that customs and miscellaneous sources furnish about $225,000,000, which falls short of the sum of expenditures and the sinking fund about $65,000,000, or short of ordinary expenditures, including pensions and interest, about $19,000,000, and leaving nothing for the sinking fund. This would be the deficit on the total repeal of all internal taxation.

But as customs and the miscellaneous sources supply $225,000,000, the internal taxes are only needed to supply $65,000,000, the difference between the total expenditure of $290,000,000 and the revenue of $225,000,000 thus obtained from customs and miscellaneous sources.

Now, as my colleague [Mr. CABELL] has said, the total repeal of tax on cigars and tobacco will be, say, $23,000,000, on spirits used in manufacture not more than $7,000,000, and on brandies from fruits about $2,000,000; in all about $32,000,000; leaving more than $80,000,000 from the tax on spirits, beer, &c. Add this sum to $225,000,000 from customs and miscellaneous sources, and we will have over $305,000,000 to meet $290,000,000 of demands on the Treasury for ordinary expenses, pensions, interest on debt, and the sinking fund.

This bill will therefore leave ample means for the Government's needs and relieve the people of taxes which only put a useless surplus into the Treasury to tempt to unconstitutional legislation, to reckless extravagance, and to official corruption.

Again, there is a strong reason, and a special one, why this tax on tobacco should be repealed. The law which imposes it singles out this one product of the farmer for taxation, subjects the producer to restrictions upon its free sale, and, with the zeal of inquisitorial watchfulness, pursues it from the plant-bed to the hand of the consumer. The same may be said of the vast surplus fruit product of the country, which rots in the hands of the producer because he can not take it to market in the condition of distilled spirits.

But the tax on tobacco is a most unequal one. It has all the evils which have been condemned as involved in the system of specific duties under the tariff system. It taxes the cheap article consumed by the poor as heavily as the dear article consumed by the rich. If it be, as is often said, a luxury to the consumer, why is that luxury which poverty consumes made to bear an equal tax with that which wealth consumes? Why lay the 8 cents tax on the tobacco which the laboring classes use, and the same upon the tobacco used by the millionaire, and which costs five times as much? This is unequal, unjust, and oppressive, and should be abolished entirely, because it discriminates in favor of the rich and against the poor.

But there is another reason for the repeal of these taxes which has not been mentioned. It is this:

The framers of the Constitution knew that the subjects of taxation must be distributed between the Federal Government and the States. The States are denied the power to lay customs duties. That has been given exclusively to the Federal Government. The tax on land and on the person (together constituting what by judicial construction is held to be the "direct taxes" referred to in the Constitution), and the excise and other taxes on employments, occupations, income, and the like are common subjects of taxation for both governments. In practice, through all our history, our financial policy has been to leave to the States the domain of direct and internal taxation, and confine the Federal power to customs duties, which are exclusively its own.

Let the Federal Government take off its hand from tobacco and spirits and leave it to the States, and large revenues would be thence derived for their treasuries, to the relief of the people from direct taxes on property. When the Federal Government reaches out to grasp these subjects of taxation, which are common to both governments, it operates to enlarge the sphere of Federal taxation and to contract that of the States. It does more: by thus enlarging its own revenues and decreasing those of the States respectively it expands more readily its functions where money is the means of their exercise, and dwarfs those of the States, divested of power, because too stinted in their revenues to exercise it. Nothing could and does tend more to the centralization of power in this Government at the expense of the States than the continuation of this internal-revenue system of taxation.

For example: By this system the Federal Government collects at 8 cents a pound on tobacco and by its tax on cigars over $3,000,000 in Virginia. Repeal the tax and Virginia, by a tax of 1 cent on tobacco, could raise a revenue of over $400,000 every year for the education of its people and for other State purposes. It can not do so now, for it is ousted of the power by the exclusive action of Congress.

On broad grounds of a sound constitutional policy, therefore, and looking to the equilibrium of powers between this Government and the States, I insist these taxes should be repealed. Money is the root of power, and by enlarging the means by which this Government can raise it, and contracting in the same degree the means of the States, you will steadily strip the States of their authority and centralize all power in this Government.

Now, as to the other clause of the bill in reference to spirits used in manufactures, that is for the benefit of the manufacturing class of the country. The gentleman from Louisville [Mr. WILLIS] has a great interest there which has appealed to this Government for years to have the tax on spirits used in the manufacture of drugs repealed entirely. This bill proposes to do it. And that is sound policy.

Mr. WILLIS. And we want it taken off also as to fruit brandies.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; and that the tax shall be remitted also as to the fruit brandies. Here are the products of the soil in which the farmer is interested, the product of tobacco, the product of apples and peaches, and so on; and these are the only means by which some farmers can make a living; and they only are seized by this Government, these products of agriculture, and crushed by this heavy internal-revenue taxation. This bill would then give great relief to these agricultural products of the farming classes. It relieves from taxation, then, only agricultural products which are subject to it. We protect manufactures by a system against which my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is as much opposed as I am, by heavy duties. Congress ought to lend some aid to the farmer; but instead of doing so, with one hand you crush him by keeping this heavy internal-revenue taxation upon the products of his fields and with the other you oppress him by high protective duties on all that he consumes. You strike a blow at him through his production and through his consumption.

I appeal to gentlemen on all sides of the House to favor the passage of this bill.

But gentlemen say if you repeal the internal-revenue taxes you will have to raise the customs duties. In my judgment nothing is more fallacious.

The logical framework of a protective tariff is that which makes duties so high as to prohibit importation of foreign goods. But if importation be prohibited no revenue accrues. Lessen the duties and protection decreases, as revenue on increased importations increases. The present tariff on many articles is so high as to protect the domestic article by almost absolute prohibition of the importation of the foreign article. This is the case with blankets, hats of wool, and hundreds of other articles.

Repeal the internal-revenue system, and Congress will be compelled to abandon the prohibitory rates of duties to adjust them to the revenue standard; and they will then be high enough to raise all the revenue you need, to give full encouragement to the industries of the country, and make the people more prosperous under a state of things more natural and less artificial—when capital will have fair profits, laborers full wages, and the interests of the consuming classes will be promoted by leaving them to untaxed production, and relieving them from the heavy burdens now resting upon consumption.

But gentlemen say, Mr. Speaker, that we had better wait until the next administration before we do anything in this matter. Why should we delay the removal of the unjust burdens which the people bear? Why should the farmer longer wait?

> Rusticus exspectat dum defluat amnis; at ille
> Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum.

[Laughter.] We want the tax repealed now. I do not care by whom or by what party it is done. I am not such a partisan as to reject the relief because tendered by Republicans. I will not claim the exclusive honor for the Democratic party here to do this just thing and to achieve this victory for right against an oppressive wrong. Let Democrats and Republicans unite in patriotic alliance to do justice to the people of the country, and the people will be satisfied. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I shall spend no time in replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who seems to think the salt industry is involved in this bill. [Laughter.] We do not pump brine with whisky. [Laughter.] Nor shall I spend any time in replying to the point made by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that this bill has not been considered by any committee of the House. Why has not the Ways and Means Committee considered the matter and brought in a bill for the action of the House is the question I propound to him.

Mr. Speaker, let us look at the tax on spirits used in the mechanic arts. It is a direct tax on the consumer. It goes into the cost of the production of those articles in general use in the United States; into the production of all the paints, varnish, drugs, and very many other articles in most general use by all classes of people. When you relieve the manufacturing industries of this tax you will of course reduce the price of their products to the people to the extent of the reduction.

Now let us look for one moment at the article of tobacco. There is no tax levied in this country which is more onerous on the poor man, on the laboring men, than the tax on tobacco. It is too late to say we will drive it out of use or that they should not use it. All classes consume tobacco, and the tax comes more largely from the laboring and poorer classes than from any other, and you are therefore directly relieving them by the passage of this bill.

It has been urged this bill is in the interest of manufacturing industries. No, sir; this bill is in the interest of the consumers of these goods. There is that rivalry existing to-day in all of the manufacturing industries of this country that they have forced down the prices of their products to the lowest point at which they can manufacture with any profit to themselves; and when you take this tax of seven or ten millions of dollars from these industries the result must be to still further reduce the prices of the commodities they manufacture and compound.

The bill, sir, is in the interest of the consumer; it is in the interest of the agricultural classes of this country that produce the "raw materials," and it is in the interest of the laboring men, and I can not imagine a class or an individual that will be harmed by the passage of the bill.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear my friend from Texas to-day. It is curious to notice the change in his tone. Only last year he was constantly complaining of these "burdens of taxation" upon the people of this country. "Revenue reform," "reduce the burdens of the tax upon the people," take off these "onerous taxes" we heard on all occasions from his lips; but now, forsooth, we hear a very different sort of argument.

Mr. MILLS. You do not pretend to say that I ever advocated taking the tax off whisky and tobacco?

Mr. CHACE. I say that you talked about revenue reform incessantly; and now the opportunity is presented to put it into practice. The last campaign was fought upon revenue reform and reduction of taxation.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it revenue reform to keep the tax upon cotton goods and take it off of liquors?

Mr. CHACE. And I ask gentlemen on all sides, and the gentleman from Texas particularly, to put themselves on record in favor of revenue reform.

Why, it was only two or three years ago that we heard a great deal about the "blood tax," as it was called, the tax on quinine, and you gentlemen took the duties off of quinine nominally, and yet you still tax it, because one of the most important elements of its manufacture is alcohol, on which you retain the tax. Now redeem your pledges to the people; take the tax off alcohol and let them have cheap quinine.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman from Rhode Island whether he has ever heard of apple-brandy being used in the manufacture of quinine?

[Here the hammer fell].

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate under the rule has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island a question.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has been exhausted.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. I ask consent to print some remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

Mr. MILLS. There are several gentlemen around me who wish that privilege. I ask, therefore, that it be extended to all who desire to avail themselves of it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to print certain extracts from the Secretary's report—one McCulloch.

Mr. KELLEY. And I would like to print some extracts from the speech of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, in favor of the repeal of the spirit tax because it is a tax on raw material. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Print the whole speech.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to amend my remarks in reference to the amount of the reduction which will be made if this bill passes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks consent that all gentlemen desiring to avail themselves of the privilege shall be allowed to print remarks in the RECORD, and, if there be no objection, of course the gentleman from New York can amend or extend his remarks.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, various questions are involved in the wholesale change proposed by this bill. It involves the surplus. The President says that the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the total receipts for the fiscal year which will end June 30, 1885, at $330,000,000, and the total expenditures at $290,620,201.16, in which sum are included the interest on the debt and the amount payable to the sinking fund. This would leave a surplus for that entire year of about $39,000,000. The surplus for 1866 will be the same as for 1885. (Treasury Report, vii.)

From the customs the ordinary revenues for the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1884, were:

From customs	$195,067,489
From internal revenue	121,586,072
From other sources	31,866,307
Total	348,519,868

The surplus for that year was $57,603,396. No one objects to a reduction of the surplus. But the main point is that it be done discreetly and with wisdom. A motion like this has not had proper deliberation, nor has any one the privilege except the mover to say the effect of his bill.

One effect is apparent. This bill does not touch the odious internal-revenue machinery. Its espionage remains. The spy still lives. The intimidation and venality remain. It is simply an abolition of a portion of the revenue, so as to avoid a future reduction of the worst tariff that ever cursed a country.

Now, the taxes repealed by this bill are the easiest paid of any taxes. They all go to the Treasury unless there be fraud. The taxes relieved are not those on necessaries. If our platforms mean anything, they mean that on such articles as tobacco and spirits the tax should be the last to be removed.

I asked leave to print the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury. They are not the views of a politician, but of an economist and statesman. He observes what his predecessor observed and what the President urged, that the surplus should be cut down, but not exclusively on the internal-revenue basis. The extracts I desired to print justify the vote against this immature measure. The Secretary is eager to have a commission, unless something better can be devised. Something better can be devised. A new Congress not committed to one idea, but anxious to increase our trade and trade off our surplus production by enlarging our markets, may devise something better.

> The condition of the manufacturing interest of the United States is similar in some respects to the condition of the agricultural interest of the West in the early days to which I have referred. What the Western farmers then needed was a market for their crops. What manufacturers now need is a market for their surplus manufactures.
> The all-important question, therefore, that presses itself upon the public attention is, how shall the country be relieved from the plethora of manufactured goods, and how shall plethora hereafter be prevented? It is obvious that our power to produce is much in excess of the present or any probable future demand for home consumption. The existing iron, cotton, and woolen mills, if employed at their full capacity, could meet in six months—perhaps in a shorter time—the home demand for a year. It is certain, therefore, that unless markets now practically closed against us are opened, unless we can share in the trade which is monopolized by European nations, the depression now so severely felt will continue and may become more disastrous.
> The question how shall our foreign trade be increased is the question which now comes to the front and demands prompt and careful consideration. Manufacturers are primarily interested, but the whole country has a stake in its solution. In its investigation the tariff will necessarily be involved, inasmuch as the relations between it and our foreign trade are so close that they can not be considered separately, but it need not be involved except so far as it stands in the way of international trade. If the duties upon raw materials are an obstruction, those duties should be removed. If the duties upon other articles are an obstruction, they should be modified. Whatever may be required to increase our foreign trade, whether it be a repeal or modification of existing duties, should be demanded by the manufacturers themselves. How, then, shall the information required for a full understanding of what stands in the way of an increased exportation of our manufactured goods be obtained? It may not be proper for me to offer advice on this point, but I can not forbear to say that I can see no better means than by the appointment of a commission, composed of men not wedded to the doctrines of free trade or protection—fair-minded men, who would prosecute the inquiry thoroughly, comprehensibly, and impartially. If such a commission should be created, it should be done without unnecessary delay.
> It is true that previous commissions have not accomplished all that was expected of them. The cause of this partial failure it is not necessary to inquire into, but this failure should not prevent the appointment of such a commission as has been suggested, unless something better can be devised. It is very clear that what is needed can not be accomplished through the agency of the Committee on Ways and Means. So vast in its comprehensive reach is the question to be investigated, and so complicated is it by the changing policy of other nations, that this committee would lack the time required for its thorough investigation. Besides, the Committee on Ways and Means is usually appointed to sustain measures to which the party in control in the House is pledged, rather than to give to subjects referred to it that impartial consideration which is needed to correct conclusions. Nor is the fact to be overlooked that even constituted as this committee has been, and able as have been its members, there has rarely, if ever, been a committee which so reflected the sentiments or commanded the respect of the House as to be able to carry through without important changes the bills which it had prepared.

It is, therefore, obvious that some other agency than the Committee on Ways and Means must be resorted to in order that the House may have the information absolutely needed for correct conclusions in regard to the nature of the obstructions in the way of an extension of our foreign trade and the best means of removing them. The labors of a commission, if properly performed, would be very great. Ample time, therefore, should be allowed for their performance.

The business of the whole world has been revolutionized by steam-power and the substitution of machinery for hand-work. If not the inventor of the steam-engine, Great Britain took the lead in utilizing it in manufacturing, and she thus became the great workshop of the world. For many years she had a monopoly in manufacturing. The raw materials from nearly all nations were taken in her own ships to her ports and returned in manufactured goods. It has been the profit of this combination of manufactures and commerce which has made her the richest and most powerful of nations. Now, however, all Western nations are endeavoring to use their raw materials at home and to encourage and sustain their manufactures by protective duties, the effect of which has been general overproduction.

It is this great revolution caused by steam-power and machinery and their general use that will make the labors of the commission so arduous. All the leading nations of the world are now engaged in manufacturing, and all but Great Britain are fencing themselves in by protective duties.

When the real condition of our foreign trade and the character of the competition in which we must sooner or later engage are fully understood, it will be found that our inability to make that trade as free as our best interests require lies in the necessity which exists for heavy import duties, which, although they may be levied for revenue only, must be in a large degree protective.

It is upon such taxes, therefore, that our Government must mainly rely for its large current expenditures and the reduction of the national debt. Large revenues will be derived from the taxes upon whisky and tobacco, if the tax on the latter article should be retained, but our chief revenue must be derived from import duties. To show how these duties may be imposed and distributed as to neither imperil our manufactures nor obstruct our foreign trade, while the Treasury is kept in an easy condition, will be the task of the commission. That the task will be a very difficult one is certain; that it may be successfully performed ought to be certain also.

In the commencement of its work the commission should, I think, regard the following points as being settled:

First. That the public revenues are not to be in excess of what may be required for the support of the Government and the gradual reduction of the public debt.

Second. That our manufactures, which under the fostering care of the Government have attained such gigantic proportions and whose prosperity is essential to the welfare of all other interests, are not to be put in jeopardy by radical and sweeping changes in the tariff; and that all reductions of import duties should be made with a view to their ultimate advantage by opening to them markets from which they are now in a large degree excluded.

Something has been done, and more might be done, to increase our foreign trade by reciprocal treaties, but the advantage to be derived from such treaties would be restricted and partial; and there are very serious objections to treaties which affect the public revenues, on the ground that they are an encroachment upon the rights of the House of Representatives, in which, under the Constitution, all revenue bills must originate.

As to the persons who should constitute the commission there will be various opinions. It might be composed of persons who have no connection with the Government or of Senators and members of the House, but I strongly incline to the opinion that it should be composed of members of the House only, because, in the investigation of the subject of our foreign trade, questions affecting the public revenues will necessarily be involved; and that members should be selected from those who have been re-elected to the Forty-ninth Congress, in order that its work may be explained and defended by those who have performed it. It would be advisable also that the Secretary of the Treasury should ex officio be a member of the commission, in order that the views of the Treasury Department and those of the commission may be in accord.

In the preceding remarks the tariff has been only indirectly referred to. From this it must not be inferred that I am not in favor of a reform of the tariff, but rather that the subjects of the tariff and foreign trade are so intimately connected that they must, in my opinion, be considered together. Have we not reached the stage when a policy should be adopted which will embrace and harmonize the great interests of the country?

If such a commission as has been suggested had been appointed, and its work could be performed at an early date, I should not be disposed to say anything bearing directly upon the tariff, but as relief from the present burden of taxation is urgently and justly demanded, I deem it my duty to suggest that something in this direction should be done without delay. Owing to the shortness of the time allowed to me for the consideration of the subject, I am not prepared to name the articles upon which duties should be removed or reduced. I should regret this if Congress were not already in possession of the facts which should govern its action. This much, however, it may be proper for me to recommend:

First. That the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufacture should be removed. This can be done in the interest of our foreign trade.

Second. That the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those who are the least able to bear the burden of taxation should be reduced. This also can be effected without prejudice to our export trade.

In regard to our internal-revenue taxes, I have to say that as these taxes, with the exception of the tax upon whisky, ought not to be and will not be needed for revenue if appropriations are kept within reasonable bounds and rigid economy is established in all branches of the public service, I see no good reason for their continuance. The tax upon bank-note circulation I shall refer to in my remarks upon national banks. Taxes upon agricultural productions, although indirectly levied, are inconsistent with our general policy, and tobacco is the only one of these productions which has been taxed. An article which is so generally used, and which adds so much to the comfort of the large numbers of our population who earn their living by manual labor, can not properly be considered a luxury, and as the collection of the tax is expensive and troublesome to the Government, and is especially obnoxious and irritative to small manufacturers, the tax upon tobacco should, in my judgment, be removed.

The tax upon whisky could not be repealed without a disregard of public sentiment, nor without creating a necessity for higher duties upon imported goods, but while this is true the tax upon the alcohol used in manufacturing might be removed with decided benefit to home industry and foreign trade.

Under the provisions of section 3433, Revised Statutes, as amended, spirits used in the manufacture for export of certain enumerated articles are freed from the tax of 90 cents per gallon. This law has greatly increased the exportation of the articles therein named.

These articles, however, constitute but a very small portion of those in the manufacture of which alcohol is used, or in which it would be used were it not for the tax thereon.

In Great Britain spirits have been used in manufactures free of tax since the year 1856, the spirits having been previously mixed with wood naphtha or "methylated."

It is understood that spirits thus methylated are unfit to be used as a beverage, while they remain uninjured for the general purposes of manufacturing. It is suggested, therefore, that provision be made for the use of domestic methylated spirits, free of tax, as a measure tending to encourage manufactures, both for home use and for exportation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 127, not voting 118; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WACO, TEX.

Mr. MILLS. I move to suspend the rules so as to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at the city of Waco, Tex. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $100,000, which sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Texas shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to state to the House that this bill passed the Senate, and a bill corresponding to it word for word——

Mr. KEIFER. The question is not debatable unless a second be ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second was not demanded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 86, noes 7.

So (further count not being called for, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill (H. R. 5667) granting a pension to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. HAMMOND. I suggest that the bill as it passed the House should first be read and afterward the amendments of the Senate.

The bill as it passed the House was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 and '48 with Mexico, or who, being enlisted as aforesaid, actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any person not a citizen of the United States.

SEC. 2. That pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month and payable only from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension-roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was put upon such roll through false and fraudulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other evidence of service performed and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient.

SEC. 4. That the pension laws now in force which are not inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby made a part of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any attorney, claim agent, or any other person to demand or receive a fee greater than $10 for services rendered in behalf of a claimant under this act.

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to the pensioners under this act.

SEC. 7. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 7, after the words "United States," strike out these words: "Who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 and '48 with Mexico, or who, being enlisted as aforesaid, actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war."

And insert the following:

"Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army and Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation."

In section 1, line 18, after the word "said," strike out "wars" and insert "war."

In section 1, line 18, after the word "war," strike out the following:

"Although their term of service may have been less than sixty days."

In section 1, line 20, after the word "men," strike out these words:

"As were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men."

In section 1, line 23, after the word "remarried" strike out these words:

"And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any person not a citizen of the United States."

At the end of section 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the rebellion against the authority of the United States."

In section 2, line 1, after the word "under," insert "section 1 of."

At the end of section 2, insert the following:

"Or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month."

In section 3, line 14, after the word "other," insert the word "record."

In section 3, line 14, after the words "evidence of," insert "enlistment and."

In section 3, line 15, after the word "service," strike out the word "performed."

At the end of section 3 insert the following:

"Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant, under any act of Congress, for and on account of service in the said war with Mexico, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge; but such evidence shall not be conclusive and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted."

In section 5, after the word "act," strike out the words "to be paid when" and insert "which shall not be demanded or received until."

At the end of section 5 insert the following:

"And any person violating the provisions of this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 5485 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Insert the following additional sections:

"SEC. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; and such pension shall commence at the date of filing an application therefor. The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability: Provided, That no person entitled to or receiving an invalid pension under existing laws, or such as may be hereafter enacted, granting pensions for disabilities contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, greater than that provided for herein, shall receive the benefits of this act; but any applicant for such invalid pension having an application therefor pending, or who shall hereafter file his application for such pension, may, by a declaration over his own signature, at any time, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act or under the general laws, and his pension, when allowed, if prosecuted under this act, shall commence from the date of such election.

SEC. 9. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who as such are now receiving, under existing laws, general or special, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors in service or from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows or minor children who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

SEC. 10. That if any invalid pensioner pensioned for a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow or minor child under 16 years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow and minor children shall be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing laws, without being required to prove that the death of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States, and shall receive the rates now allowed by law, except that such as may be found to be entitled to $8 per month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 per month.

SEC. 11. That pensions granted widows on account of minor children shall be continued without limit as to age, whenever it shall appear that such minors are of unsound mind or physically helpless, so as to render them incapable of earning a subsistence: Provided, That such widow retains the care, custody, and control of such minors; and in the event of the death or remarriage of such widow, or abandonment by her of such minors, then the pension and additional pension shall be continued to them in their own right, without limit as to age, during the continuance of such disability, payable to a duly constituted guardian.

SEC. 12. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of comfortable support than his or her own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for his or her support; and such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from the date of this act.

SEC. 13. That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, that fact shall be prima facie evidence of soundness at the time of his enlistment; but such presumption shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other competent evidence.

SEC. 14. That no person shall be entitled to more than one pension at the same time under any or all laws of the United States, whether such pension shall have been already obtained or shall be hereafter obtained, unless the act under which such pension is claimed shall specially so declare.

Mr. HAMMOND. I demand a second.

Mr. KEIFER. Will there be objection to considering the second as ordered?

Mr. HAMMOND. I object.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Some of these amendments have already gone to the Committee of the Whole under the ruling of the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. But there is no question before the House, except the matter of a second. The gentleman's inquiry might be in order afterward.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I withhold the parliamentary inquiry for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. KEIFER, will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 68.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is seconded. Under the rules thirty minutes are now allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to enter upon any discussion until we hear from the other side. This bill with the amendments has been before the country a long time. There have been more petitions for the passage of this bill with these amendments than have come to this House in favor of any other bill within my knowledge. I yield the floor for the present to the gentleman who is to control the debate on the other side.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to debate this measure. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the position and magnitude of the measure. We passed in this House a bill for pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war. A proper bill for that purpose I heartily approved. It went to the Senate, and on it were ingrafted measures to pension all the Federal soldiers of the late war. I do not know how much it will cost.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow just a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. I will.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman state that this bill as it comes from the Senate pensions all soldiers of the late war, without reference to disability? Is that what the gentleman means to be understood as saying?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not intend to be exact about it in any particular. I do not know how much this measure will cost the people. It was stated in the debate at the last session, I believe, that by the calculation of certain insurance experts it would cost between two and three thousand million dollars. I do not know whether that is true or not, but certainly it is true that these amendments would entail upon the people an immense burden of taxation.

I fear that many of the gentlemen who favor these amendments in the Senate, and who will favor them here, are simply pandering to the disposition to make the soldiers believe that the people would do everything, anything for them. I believe they at the same time hope that the conservative Democrats will keep this burden off the shoulders of the people, notwithstanding the "buncombe" which urges the action.

I have said all that I care to say about the bill except to state this novel condition of things: the fourth and fifth amendments are now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon a point of order, yet the proposition is to take them away from that committee, to take the bill from the table of the Speaker and to pass it with the amendments, when no man would risk his reputation upon an attempt to fix a limit as to the quantum of taxation which the measure with these amendments will entail. I desire, before I take my seat, to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] categorically to answer how many dollars he thinks it will take to meet the exigencies of this legislation. I will wait for the answer now.

Mr. KEIFER. I am unable to give the gentleman an accurate statement as to the number of dollars.

Mr. HAMMOND. Can you say within one thousand millions?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then tell me.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, it will not take any "thousand millions" at all.

Mr. HAMMOND. How much will it take?

Mr. KEIFER. That would be a sufficient answer to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMMOND. How many will it take?

Mr. KEIFER. I am unable to give an exact answer, or even a very good approximate answer.

Mr. HAMMOND. I stated, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat now with emphasis, that no man who regards his reputation for honesty will undertake even to guess the amount which this measure in its present shape will require to carry out its provisions.

I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to make a parliamentary inquiry which I started to make a few moments ago, and I ask that this shall not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Several of these amendments have been already referred to the Committee of the Whole under the ruling of the Chair. My inquiry is this: If this bill should now pass, in what condition would it be? A part of these amendments are in Committee of the Whole. Will they be taken out of the Committee of the Whole and restored to their place on the bill?

The SPEAKER. That depends upon the form of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. If the gentleman moves to suspend the rules and concur in all the amendments, the motion, if adopted, would be, of course, a concurrence in the amendments which have been sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as well as the others. The Chair has not examined closely the form of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire then to know exactly what the gentleman's motion is.

Mr. KEIFER. I can state it. My motion was to concur in all the Senate amendments to the House bill; and I wish to say that while the Chair has held that certain amendments must under the rules be first considered in Committee of the Whole, they have never been sent there.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules——

Mr. KEIFER. And would suspend among others the rule which would require the consideration of the amendments in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] would depend, as the Chair has stated, upon the form of the motion.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the real meaning of this bill. If the principle involved in the provisions of the bill relating to the soldiers of the Mexican war be extended to the Union soldiers of the late war, as it must be and ought to be if adopted here, then I say this measure will involve an expenditure of not less than $2,500,000,000. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have not here at my desk the estimates made by the Commissioner of Pensions during the last session of Congress for the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, which showed that the principle involved here, if applied to the Union soldiers of the late war, would entail an expenditure of some $2,200,000,000; and that was upon the bill as it passed the House, not as amended by the Senate; and the Senate amendments would add considerably to that amount.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he can state the amount the Committee on Pensions estimated would be the cost of the arrearages act and the cost up to this time?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The estimate of the cost of the arrearages act was somewhere, I believe, about $20,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; that was about it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And it has cost from two hundred to two hundred and fifty millions of dollars already; I forget exactly how much.

Mr. REAGAN. And will cost some $600,000,000 before it is done with.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; and will cost many millions of dollars more, no doubt.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish more especially to call attention to the principle of the bill as it relates to Mexican soldiers. Here the pension is purely a service pension, and not only that, but this bill grants to a man who enlisted in the war with Mexico after the war was all over, if he merely started from home and was borne on the rolls fourteen days—it grants to him, sir, a pension for life and his widow after him; and not only that, Mr. Speaker, but it grants to him the same pension that it grants to the soldiers who fought the battles of that war and won its victories. Yes, the same pension that it grants to a man who followed the flag under Taylor from Monterey to Buena Vista, or who marched with Scott from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, who endured all the hardships of that war, endured the climate of that country, and who suffered wounds and disability in that service—under this bill, I say, such a man, the true hero of that war, gets no more pension than the man who enlisted after the war was all over. Now, apply that principle, I say, to the Union soldiers of the late war, and what would be the result? And I maintain that you must do it if that principle is adopted in this bill. We must have uniformity and equality in our pension laws. Apply that principle, then, to the Union soldiers, and grant the same pensions to the men who were borne on the rolls but fourteen days, or who enlisted after the fighting was all over, that you grant to men who served one, two, three, or four years, who went through all the campaigns, endured all the hardships and participated in all the struggles and battles of that war, and you see to what it leads. In another war would such a principle be safe? Is such a principle right? No, sir; the principle itself is wrong. It is unjust. It never can be right. It is unsafe to establish and ought to defeat any bill based upon it.

If we depart from the principle of disability pension and grant pensions for service alone, then I maintain that we should grade the pension according to the service which the soldier has rendered. But here you give the same pension for no service, no hardships, no battles, no wounds, no scars, no disability, no anything, that you give for wounds and scars and disability incurred during years of service. To do that, sir, in my judgment, is to enact into law a manifest injustice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving the balance of my time until after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has been heard, I will resume my seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has five minutes left.

Mr. KEIFER. How many minutes have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fourteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] for three minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention at the beginning of this session of Congress to call up the House bill granting pensions to Mexican soldiers, as it was returned from the Senate with amendments, in order that it might be disposed of at the earliest practicable moment, but as the rules prohibited any such motion being made within the first six days of the session, and inasmuch as then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], chairman of the Committee on Commerce, obtained the floor and called up the interstate commerce bill, I announced in the House it was my purpose to call up the bill pensioning the soldiers in the war with Mexico from the Speaker's table as soon as that interstate commerce bill was disposed of. I suppose that it will be disposed of to-morrow or the next day, and then it was my intention to call up House bill pensioning the soldiers in the war with Mexico, and dispose of the Senate amendments as they were reached. I believe now that bill should be disposed of in the next two or three days. If this motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill shall fail, it is my purpose to take up that House bill with the Senate amendments for consideration as soon as the interstate commerce bill has been disposed of. If, however, the discussion of that interstate commerce bill shall be protracted, I give notice that I shall raise the question of consideration even on that bill for the purpose of having the bill for the benefit of the soldiers in the war with Mexico brought up for consideration and passed.

I wish to say further that while I am not entirely satisfied with the Senate amendments to this bill, and especially those relating to the soldiers of the Mexican war, and while I have had strong hopes we could reach an arrangement by which the House bill, with the Senate amendments, could be placed in the control of a conference committee, and the whole matter could be disposed of in such a way as to give satisfaction to all sides of the House, that nevertheless, as this motion is now before the House, I shall vote for it.

I am not as much frightened at the danger of depleting the Treasury by distributing the surplus among the soldiers of the country as some other gentlemen seem to be. I believe such distribution will bring about prosperity in the country.

It will circulate in every neighborhood throughout the land. If the entire surplus now in the Treasury was divided in payment of pensions to the soldiers it would be no hardship upon the people of this country, but would rather be a benefit to all. I believe, sir, that the time is near when we can economize by putting every man who fought under the flag of this country, no matter in what war, upon the pension-rolls, abolish the Pension Bureau, and discharge the clerks employed in the Pension Office, the Surgeon-General's, the Adjutant's Office, and other departments of the Government engaged in that business.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, nearly forty years have elapsed since the close of the Mexican war. Following the precedents, it is proper that the soldiers who served in that war should be placed upon the pension-roll as a reward for their services.

In addition, the Senate amendments to this bill, as I understand it, place all of the soldiers of the late war who are disabled and who are dependent in whole or in part upon their labor for a support upon the pension-roll according to their disability, and I believe it right that this should be done whether it costs much or little. I do not believe it will cost more than from fifteen to sixteen millions of dollars per annum, according to the best estimates I have been able to procure.

The proposed legislation is but justice to the soldier and will prove a measure of economy to the Government. The nation can not afford to withhold from its defenders in the field proper relief and compensation. In every neighborhood, at least in the northern part of the country, can be found one or more Union soldiers in the late war who are disabled and needy, and who can not make the technical proof required under the law to place their names on the pension-roll. Yet they know, and their neighbors know, they ought to be pensioned. The time will come, following the precedents, when all Union soldiers of the late war will have their names placed on the pension-roll without reference to disability, and unless we afford relief to those who are actually disabled, by this or similar legislation, you will find that public opinion will demand that justice be done these disabled soldiers, even if in doing them justice it is necessary to put the names of all soldiers of the Union Army on the pension-roll at an earlier day than it would otherwise be done.

It would be economical to give this legislation. It is right to give it; and therefore I shall vote for it now; and I say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that I have no confidence whatever, considering the filibustering tactics of gentlemen on that side of the House during the last session of Congress, that this bill will ever become a law unless it becomes so within sixty minutes of this time, so far as the House is concerned.

Again, it is right and proper to increase the pension of the widow whose husband died from injuries received in the service from $8 to $12 a month as old age comes upon her and her necessities annually increase.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. It will be absolutely impossible to consider this bill under the rules of this House at any other time than to-day for the purpose of passing it. Every man who is familiar with what we call our regulations for doing business, but which are in fact regulations to prevent the doing of business, knows that it is absolutely impossible to consider this bill as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested that he will attempt to consider it; and while for my part I do not believe that such a measure should be considered in this way, yet what is called the wisdom of this House has decided that this is the only manner in which it can be considered.

I believe that so far from involving an expenditure of so large a sum as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] it will cost not more than $20,000,000 per annum increase over the present pension appropriations, and I think that the revenues of this country can well stand such an increase. Therefore under all of these circumstances I shall vote for this bill, and I hope the House will concur with the Senate in the amendments in order that we may dispose of it to-day; for I asseverate again, without fear of contradiction from any man who knows what are called the rules of this House, that unless we pass it to-day we never shall pass it unless we change the rules for that express purpose.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who have preceded me that now is the time to pass this bill. Both sides of this House have placed themselves in the attitude of being responsible for the passage of the measure. In the first place, that side of the House, aided largely by this, passed a bill granting a pension to every Mexican soldier. Some of the men who are to be the beneficiaries of that bill are worth tens of thousands of dollars, some are worth hundreds of thousands, and others millions of dollars, and yet they all fall within the provisions of the original bill which passed this House to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war. That bill went to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate struck out from it the provisions relating to the Mexican soldiers who were able to take care of themselves, those who have an abundance of this world's goods and who have no necessity for a pension, and included within the category all of those who should be pensioned on account of necessity arising from ill health and indigent circumstances and all Mexican soldiers when they attain the age of 62 years. It went also a step further and included those of the Union soldiers of the late war who are in indigent circumstances and who need the support of the Government.

Will anybody refuse to grant pensions to these men who are in indigent circumstances, who served their country, and who need this support from this Government, let it cost much or little? But this is a bugbear about the cost. The cost has been estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions to be about $16,000,000. Suppose it is $20,000,000, suppose it is $25,000,000. It is raised by taxes imposed upon the people of the country, and it is a question whether the Government of the United States shall pay this or whether the people shall pay it by taxes levied upon themselves in their homes and in their own States. This money must be paid in any event. And in my mind plainly the great duty of the Government is to provide for these men who served their country when their country needed their services; and therefore I shall cordially vote for this bill with the Senate amendments.

Mr. KEIFER. I reserve the remainder of my time until gentlemen close the debate on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I assert that to carry out the principle of this bill will add not less than 1,250,000 names to the pension-roll.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it be a short one I will.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman mean to say this bill will do that? He talks about what the principle of the bill will do.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I say if we adopt the principle of this bill we can not stop until we apply it to the soldiers of the late war. The debates in the other end of the Capitol on this bill show that, and show what the cost would be. That that is the sentiment of the country, too, is manifest.

Let me show why it will be necessary to extend the application of the principle. The sixth amendment of the Senate provides—

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow, who is or may become 62 years of age, &c.

That is, that every officer and enlisted man who was borne for fourteen days on the roll in the Mexican war and is 62 years of age shall be pensioned. How can we adopt that principle and apply it to one war without applying it immediately to the late war? If a man is 62 years old he is 62 years old. And what odds does it make whether he served fourteen days in the Mexican war or whether he served fourteen days in the late war if the fourteen-day principle is adopted? If he served fourteen days in the Mexican war under this bill he would be entitled to a pension; but if he served three or four years in the late war he is not. Can we stand there? It would not be right to do that. No, sir; we must apply the principle to the Union soldiers as well as to the Mexican soldiers if it is to be adopted at all. Will you adopt it? A more unjust act could not be done than to put those who did no fighting and performed little or no service on the same plane with those who fought the battles, endured hardships, and suffered disability.

Many of the amendments of the Senate, most of them, I believe to be just; and bills have already been reported from committees of the House, and are now on the Calendar, embracing most of these amendments. I refer especially to amendments relating to pensions of widows and minor children and those intended to promote the settlement of claims now on file for disability incurred in the late war. I think we had better look first to cases of disability. After the battles the first duty was to take care of the wounded and disabled. Let us first pension those who were disabled in any of the wars. The fourteen-day men, I think, can wait. I am in favor of uniform pension laws—the same pensions for the same disability and the same service in one war as in another.

I honor the men who fought in the Mexican war. I honor no less those who fought in the late war. And I say the disability incurred in the one entitles a man to as much as like disability incurred in the other—service in one war to be the same as service in the other. The Government can not discriminate, and the same principle ought to govern in all cases; and if we apply the same principle I say we can not stop short of an expenditure of $2,500,000,000—twice as much as the entire pay of the Army and Navy from the beginning to the end of the war. More than the entire national debt at the close of the war. All that is involved in this bill. And yet it is proposed now to pass this bill through under a suspension of the rules and without an opportunity to amend it. I believe this principle of pensioning men for fourteen days and giving them the same as for one, two, three, or four years' service to be a dangerous one; a dangerous one to establish after a great war; a dangerous one if we should become involved in another war. I do not believe free institutions could long survive the establishment of such a principle.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one and a half minutes remaining.

Mr. HERBERT. I voted for the Mexican war pension bill as it passed this House. I shall vote against it as amended by the Senate, because I believe the measure to be unwise, extravagant, and unjust; unjust to the Mexican veterans and other classes who are discriminated against, and unjust to the tax-payers of this country, who will be saddled with a debt which this discussion has shown is absolutely incalculable.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that many of those who feel compelled to vote for this bill will thank us who take upon ourselves the responsibility of voting to defeat it. And if we defeat it, as I am sure many of you sincerely hope we will, if you do not thank us I am sure the country will.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work of the Tenth Census;

An act (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio;

An act (H. R. 4085) for the relief of Juliet H. Palmer; and

An act (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern division of the district of East Tennessee and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes.

MEXICAN WAR PENSION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield one minute to my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, there ought to be no question in regard to the amount of money which this bill will cost the Government. The Commissioner of Pensions was called upon during the last session of Congress to make an estimate of the additional amount which this bill would require for the payment of pensions. He did so, and he made his report to members of this House. It was twice stated upon this floor, once by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and on another occasion I stated it myself. I have frequently conversed with the Commissioner of Pensions on this subject. I understand from him that he made his estimate very carefully, calling to his aid the ablest assistants in the employ of the Government, and this estimate is still unquestioned by the Department. And according to this estimate it will cost the Government from four to four and a half million dollars a year to pay the soldiers of the Mexican war as provided in this bill as amended by the Senate, and about twelve or twelve and a half million dollars a year to pay the Union soldiers embraced in these Senate amendments.

This is the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, as made by him with the aid of Government experts skilled in this branch of knowledge, certainly the most reliable authority on this subject obtainable anywhere; and if this bill is passed to-day, as I hope it will be, the amount of money now paid to the pensioners of the United States will not be increased more than $17,000,000. The estimate was made on this bill as it is now introduced.

There can be no question about the accuracy of this estimate. If you look over the provisions of this bill you will see that there is no serious difficulty in ascertaining what the cost will be. The provisions of this bill only reach a few classes, and certainly the most needy and deserving classes. It increases the pensions of widows, dependent parents, and minor children from $8 to $12 a month. It dispenses with certain proofs in regard to aged and dependent parents. It dispenses with the proof of prior soundness, proof that never ought to have been required.

If a soldier has an existing disability, and is dependent on his daily labor for support, he is not required, as now, to prove that this disability was incurred in the service, a thing which is now impossible in most cases at this long distance from the close of the war. This bill will pension him to the extent of his disability. If a pensioner dies, his pension goes to his widow and children without proof that he died from a disability incurred in the service. It also continues pensions after the age of 16 to children of dead soldiers where they are imbecile, idiotic, or blind. This is in substance the extent and character of the Senate amendments to this bill, and the money appropriated by it goes to relieve poverty and want and suffering more than any other bill ever before this or any other Congress. Besides, Mr. Speaker, this bill would greatly relieve the distressed condition of the country, and would benefit those who are not soldiers almost as much as those who are, as the money thus paid out would pass from hand to hand, and would go into all the avenues of trade, giving activity to all kinds of business.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill because I believe it is simply a measure of justice; and I am glad to have the opportunity to vote for it now, because, as has been observed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], if this bill shall not pass within the next sixty minutes I fear it will never be passed at this session or at any other. It is a measure of simple and naked justice to the veterans of the Mexican war. It does no more than simple justice to the veterans of the late war who are now disabled from gaining their livelihood by their labor, and are the objects of public and private charity. It says to the widow of the fallen soldier who died in the front of the battle that she shall no longer receive merely the $8 a month which this Government now doles out to her, but that the amount shall be increased to $12 a month. It does a like act of justice to the orphan children, left without the support of the strong arm which death paralyzed in the service of this country. It does another act of justice. It provides that when the Government has accepted a soldier, has passed him through a medical examination by an examiner of its own choice, has mustered him into the service, and put him into the ranks, he shall be presumed prima facie, to be sound, fit for military duty, and the burden of proof is shifted upon the Government. These are some of the just and righteous things that this bill will accomplish. But it will take money. I am glad of it. The treasures of this country can be put to no better use either with reference to the past or the future than to pay well-deserved pensions to the men who sacrified their strength, and the widows and orphans of those who sacrificed life that the life of the nation might be preserved.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has now three minutes remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, it is always true, when gentlemen oppose a measure that is filled with merit throughout, they must do it by undertaking to exaggerate some feature of it. When it is declared here upon the floor that this bill undertakes to pension all the Union soldiers of the recent war, that is certainly done for the purpose of defeating the bill; for there is no such provision in it, and when it is declared that it will take a thousand millions of dollars or more to make the payments required to be made under this bill, that may be classed as an exaggeration. And when the gentleman on the other side undertakes to say that these immense sums will be required, it is only another mode of opposing a just measure.

This country owes a debt of gratitude to the soldiers of the Mexican war, who are now old. There are now alive no young men who were in that war. There are very few below the age of 62. A man who was engaged in the Mexican war at 21 years of age is now 59. There are very few soldiers of that war who will not be pensioned immediately under this act.

Mr. COSGROVE rose.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to yield to the gentleman if I had time.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would ask the gentleman whether he did not vote against the Mexican pension bill when it was before the House?

Mr. KEIFER. I think not. The Mexican pension bill undertook to pension all persons who were in that war; but I do not seriously object to that, for this bill pensions nearly all of them, because it pensions all above the age of 62.

Now, while this bill in its present form proposes to pension this class of persons, these men whose sands of life are fast running out, it proposes to pension at the same time men of the Union Army who are today broken down by disease—not through any fault of theirs——

The SPEAKER. The debate has now closed.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. That is another mode of opposing this bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAMMOND, there were—ayes 62, noes 105.

Mr. HAMMOND. Was there a quorum?

Mr. KEIFER. None is necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that there should be a quorum on this question; but a quorum has voted.

Mr. CABELL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, 33 voting in favor thereof—less than one-fifth of the last vote.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendments to the bill as read to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 129, nays 85, not voting 109, as follows:

So the motion was disagreed to (two-thirds not having voted therefor).

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. BOYLE, on this question.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. CHACE, on this vote.

Mr. GRAVES with Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. FOLLETT with Mr. MILLIKEN, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. BREWER, of New York, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. MORRILL, on all questions, until further notice.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. MCCOID, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. DOWD with Mr. ELLWOOD, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. BOUTELLE, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. WARD with Mr. BENNETT, on the Mexican war pension bill. Mr. WARD would vote "ay" and Mr. BENNETT "no."

Mr. MILLARD with Mr. MULDROW, on all political questions, including the Mexican war pension bill. Mr. MILLARD would vote for the bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER with Mr. GUENTHER, on all political questions, until further notice.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 748) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Addie B. Bacon to the Court of Claims;

A bill (S. 896) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 1399) for the relief of William C. Dodge;

A bill (S. 1472) to permit the owners of certain vessels and cargoes to sue the United States; and

A bill (S. 1578) to amend the charter of the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home, and in relation to the assets thereof.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. COLLINS moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That Senate bill 1372, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States, be taken from the Speaker's table and be made a special order for Thursday, January 22, 1885, to be considered in the House; the consideration to be continued from day to day until finally acted upon, not to interfere with general appropriation and revenue bills.

Mr. WILLIS. I demand a second.

Mr. REAGAN. Will not this interfere with the interstate commerce bill?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of debate. The Chair appoints as tellers Mr. WILLIS and Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. WASHBURN. By unanimous consent, may we not have the second ordered?

Mr. HAMMOND. I object.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 51.

So there was a second.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 103.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. COLLINS. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the time has now come when the bankrupt law is required by the absolute necessities of the country. During the last two years the failures have risen from about sixty millions per annum to two hundred and fifty millions per annum, and they are still increasing in amount. It is common knowledge that debtors acting under the permission of the laws of their different States dispose of their assets, however great, by fraudulent preferences among their relatives and friends, and those whom they choose to put in confidential relations and positions, in such a way that the vast property which has been intrusted to them is being divided mainly or largely fraudulently among preferred creditors.

It was foreseen by our fathers that in order to give the largest value to individual liberty and to individual activity, in order to make the whole of this vast country the theater of every citizen's activity and enterprise and energy, bankrupt laws which should secure the largest division of assets among creditors would be necessary by the General Government. That necessity has been made apparent throughout the history of the country during every year of its existence. It is a necessity that exists to-day, and the time has come when we must meet the demand. It has come to this, that in matters of trade State lines are necessarily disregarded. It is an impossibility for merchants intrusting their property throughout the country to keep up with the laws of the thirty-eight States and with all of the rules and regulations of thirty-eight States, and unless a uniform bankruptcy law is passed which will operate justly and equally upon all portions of the country, practically this great provision of the Constitution—to give the whole country as the theater of activity to every man's energy and enterprise—will fail and be denied.

I hope, sir, we shall now fix a day for the consideration of this important measure; and I hope and believe that if it is considered at all it will be passed in obedience to the demands of the best interests of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I represent, I think, the business men of Chicago in saying that they all, almost without exception desire a good bankruptcy law to be passed which will administer estates economically and discourage dishonesty and reckless trading. I hold in my hand a petition to that effect signed by the representatives of all branches of trade, containing almost all of the heaviest houses engaged in trade, as well as many others of lesser business. These gentlemen do not all approve of every feature of the bill which is now pending in Congress; but I think I may say that no objection has been made, certainly none in my presence, that can not be cured by an amendment to the bill.

I was present also at the annual dinner of the Shoe and Leather Association, in which the pending bill was discussed, and the members were almost unanimously in favor of the passage of this particular bill. I will ask to have the heading of this petition printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I am sure that the business men of the country generally desire that this bill, with certain modifications it may be, shall be passed at this session of Congress.

I ask now to insert the heading of this petition as a part of my remarks.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. COLLINS. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, we stand in this position to this question: Shall we fix a day for the consideration of the bill? That is all the resolution contemplates. The Senate has given a bill, and on careful consideration of it I believe it meets nearly all the objections that made the last bankruptcy bill offensive to the best business interests of the country. The East is not alone interested in the passage of this bill. I have received more letters from my own district urging the consideration of this bill than with reference to any other bill pending before the House; and I believe in times like these, when the business interests are depressed, that the passage of a wholesome bankruptcy law will give an impetus to trade which will save our people from disasters which are threatening. With that feeling I earnestly urge upon the House the propriety of fixing a day for the consideration of the bill.

There were objections to the former bankruptcy bill which were honestly urged, but which do not apply to this. That bill was too expensive in its operations; but I believe after a careful examination of the present bill that the expenses are cut down to a minimum, and that the objections which were justly urged against the old law can not be urged with propriety against the one we have before us for consideration. But, sir, even if there are objections of that kind, it is within our power to meet and remedy them by proper amendments. We are not now discussing that question, but only the propriety of taking up the bill for consideration. Certainly the great business interests of the country from one ocean to the other ask their legislators to take up, consider, and pass the bankruptcy bill. Let us bow to that earnest demand of the business interests of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a memorial from the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, the association of wholesale grocers and other organizations of representative business men, asking the passage of a bankruptcy bill that will put a stop to the fraudulent and dishonest repudiation of honest indebtedness that has overwhelmed the country since the repeal of the last bankruptcy law. As their representative I shall certainly vote to take up and pass this bill.

Mr. COLLINS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Representing as I do the commercial interests of the city of New York, and representing the board of trade, of which I have the honor to be secretary, which has taken an active part in bringing this subject before the merchants of the country, I am able to state to the House that I hold in my hand the names of one hundred and forty commercial organizations in the United States representing thirty-four States of this Union, all asking for the passage of this Lowell bankruptcy bill. The memorials of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Ala., and the Mobile Cotton Exchange are a specimen of what come from the Southern States. The States represented here are from Maine to California and from Texas to Michigan.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. I yield one half minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY].

Mr. FINDLAY. I simply desire to say that all classes of our citizens, mercantile, mechanical, manufacturing, and I may say the professional classes, too, are deeply interested in a bankruptcy bill, and desire that an early day should be fixed for its consideration. I have in my hand here twenty or thirty letters from all these classes, who earnestly request me to use what little influence I may have to fix a day for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. I yield one minute and a half to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I hold in my hand a letter written to me by one of the largest commercial houses in the city of New York, the firm of Arnold, Constable & Co. It is similar in tone to all the letters I have received from the business men of our city, and it so well expresses the sentiment of the commercial community that I ask for its reading. It is very short and the reading will only take half a minute.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 2, 1885.

DEAR SIR: We address you as one of our Representatives in Congress from this city upon a subject the importance of which to the entire business community of this country can not be overestimated.

We allude to the pressing and vital urgency for supplanting our present wholly inadequate insolvency laws by the immediate passage at this session of Congress of the Lowell bill.

The alarming increase of failures, from $65,000,000 in 1880 to two hundred and fifty millions in 1884, renders imperative a radical change, which shall reduce to a minimum the ruinous frauds and rascalities which have been practiced with impunity upon honest business men throughout the country.

We therefore respectfully request that you will use your influence to bring up for consideration the bankruptcy bill (Senate bill 1372), and your voice to urge its adoption at this present session.

By such action you will earn and receive the thanks of all having business interests in this country, including,

Yours, respectfully,

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE & CO.

Hon. JOHN J. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COLLINS. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. I have no argument to make now against the consideration of this bill. I do not think if we were to fix a day for it that it would pass. There are so many measures connected with the appropriations that must be considered that this would be switched off the track at any rate.

But I am opposed to the passage of the bill, and therefore opposed to fixing a day for its consideration. I have opposed it during three Congresses upon the Judiciary Committee; and this is the first time it has succeeded in getting before the House on a favorable report from that committee. I respect very highly the opinions of gentlemen from the large business centers—from New York, Boston, Baltimore, and other cities—who simply desire what in their estimation would be a better collection law. They are actuated by pure selfishness. My constituency is actuated by pure selfishness the other way. They elected me to represent them, and I am glad that their views coincide with my own ideas of what is right.

The Government has tried bankrupt laws several times. It has never failed to get rid of one as early as it could possibly be done after the trial had been made. Dishonesty will exist whether there is a bankrupt law or not. The community in which I live believe there will be more dishonesty with one than without one.

I would like to have, without fatiguing the House, a petition of ten lines, with thirty names signed to it, printed as part of my remarks. If it is objected to I will have it read; if not objected to I will cease with the request that this be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to have it read in his own time.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will not occupy that time unless objection is made to the printing of the petition with the names.

Mr. COLLINS. Let it be understood, then, that the objection to printing made on the other side is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the printing of the paper indicated by the gentleman from Georgia.

The paper is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, who are merchants in the State of Georgia, respectfully represent that the business interests of which they have knowledge would suffer by the enactment of a law of bankruptcy, and pray that there be no legislation in that direction.

JANUARY 1, 1885.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON].

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a very few words in opposition to the fixing of a day for the consideration of this bill. It has been said here by gentlemen from New York and elsewhere that there have been petitions circulated in the business centers and in the country, and that the business men of the country are demanding the passage of this bankrupt bill. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that petitions have been circulated. It is equally true that these petitions have been circulated by specially interested parties; and they have sent their circulars to all the smaller city, town, and mercantile associations in the country, with the request that they sign and return the same or send them to Congress.

I want to say that those petitions and circulars relating to this bill have never been fairly considered by the persons signing them; and I venture to say that more than one-half, I might say that more than two-thirds, who have signed the petitions have never seen the bill or read it. I know that less than a year ago in the city of Chicago, notwithstanding the statement of my colleague from that city, there was a large meeting held by the Citizens' Association of Chicago, representing the business interests of that city, to consider this Lowell bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell me what that association was?

Mr. MOULTON. There is a printed petition against this bill, with hundreds of names, comprising the very best business men and names in Chicago.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What is the association to which the gentleman had reference?

Mr. MOULTON. One of the associations that considered the Lowell bill was the Citizens' Association of Chicago. That association appointed a committee of five of the most eminent lawyers in Chicago to consider the question of the Lowell bill. That committee, after full consideration, reported April 24, 1884, against this bill, giving their reasons at length. I have the report here.

In addition, in the city of Chicago, just before the meeting of the association referred to, a petition was signed by over one hundred, I think, of the largest business and manufacturing firms in Chicago, and forwarded the same to Congress, representing that in the experience of the signers the operation of a United States bankrupt law has proved to be an injury to the business interest of the whole country. Petitioners state their objections to bankrupt acts, and say, for the reasons given, they oppose any bankrupt legislation. The Wilson Sewing Machine Company and the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company were among the petitioners. The parties signing it are all representative men.

I want to say further that the largest business firms in New York and other places have numerously signed and circulated petitions of the same character. I hold some of them in my hand, and the gentleman can look at them at his leisure.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to a very significant fact. It is claimed that the necessity of a bankrupt bill is for the purpose of protecting creditors and obtaining from the bankrupt all his assets and fairly distributing them among his creditors. It is claimed more money is realized by reason of a bankrupt bill—from the bankrupt—than without one.

For the purpose of realizing the most money from the bankrupt estate no bankrupt law whatever is necessary. The history of collection in our country shows that better results are obtained and more money is collected from insolvent and bankrupt debtors when there is no bankrupt law than under one.

Let me state a fact, and let gentlemen who advocate the passage of a bankrupt bill controvert it if they can. I state as a fact that prior to the passage of the bankrupt law of 1867 more than 35 per cent. of debts of bankrupt and insolvent debtors was collected for the benefit of creditors in all the States. On the other hand, under the infamous bankrupt law of 1867 only 10 per cent. of the assets of bankrupts and insolvents was collected for the benefit of creditors, and of this amount the greater part was collected in the cities, less than 5 per cent. having been collected in the country.

Now let me state another fact. This cry for the passage of a bankrupt law comes from purely interested parties; the measure is sought for their benefit and for the benefit of dishonest traders. Taking the whole amount of business done in this country, less than 1 per cent. is lost by reason of insolvency, frauds, or bankruptcy.

These facts show that the mass of the people are honest, and no bankrupt law is necessary for the protection of the interest of any one.

But it is claimed that a bankrupt law is necessary for the protection of foreign creditors. Credit is the voluntary act of the party, and he takes his chances; he knows the risk he runs, and it is always charged somewhere in the bill.

I deny that foreign creditors run more risks and have less chance for collection than domestic creditors. I think they have a better chance than domestic creditors. In nearly every town in the United States mercantile agencies are established, and a failure or fraudulent transfer of property in a remote town in Texas is known as soon in New York or Boston as in the town itself.

The foreign creditor acts at once with the domestic creditor. Besides, the foreign creditor is permitted to resort to the Federal courts, by which he can attach all the property of the debtor to the exclusion of the domestic creditor, who can not resort to that court. There is but little to fear from fraudulent transfers. These can always be attacked by any one interested. A bankrupt law gives no advantage in this particular. More than two-thirds of the States have insolvent laws and statutes against preferences by a failing or insolvent debtor.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now proposed is, in my judgment, infinitely worse than the law of 1867. The expenses under this bill will not be less than under that law, and in my judgment they will be more. You are to have trustees, you are to have supervisors, you are to have directors and commissioners, you are to have clerks' fees, marshals' fees, and sheriffs' fees. There is hardly any limitation at all upon the charges which may be made in one way or another under this bill. This bill is more in the nature of a treatise for the purpose of teaching dishonest men how they may cheat their honest neighbors. All bankrupt bills in this country have been failures.

That a bankrupt bill works well in England, where the laws operate uniformly, no separate state governments, and the people occupying a small territory, is no reason that it would work well here, where everything is so wholly different. Our separate State and Federal Governments make any bankrupt law by the General Government impracticable.

Mr. Speaker, if a vote should be taken in this country to-day on this question, if the people could send here a fair and honest expression of their views, I have no doubt there would be more than two to one of the people against any measure of this character.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that there should be, as gentlemen state there is, unusual pressure for the consideration and passage of another bankruptcy bill, but in the interest of the comfort of members of this House, aside from the general principles involved, I desire to enter my protest against such a deplorable result. It should be remembered that within the next thirty or sixty days gentlemen of this House will be met with thousands of applications for office coming from one end of the country to the other, and I do not see why our comfort and the comfort of the country should be disturbed by precipitating upon our tender sympathies another five or fifteen thousand, which would be the effect of the passage of this bill. There are proposed here not only the old officers, whose names are now a hissing and a byword before the American people—registers and assignees and trustees and messengers—but we have commissioners and supervisors at $3,000 and $2,000 a year, besides clerk-hire, room-rent, and other expenses to be allowed by the complaisant circuit judges:

That supervisors under this act shall receive yearly salaries at the rate of $3,000, payable quarterly from the Treasury. The commissioners shall each receive an annual salary of $2,000, payable quarterly from the Treasury: Provided, That the court, both of said justices concurring, appointing them may in any case decree a further allowance, not exceeding $10 for each case instituted before them during the year, but not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $1,000. And said supervisors and commissioners may be allowed a reasonable sum for their actual and necessary disbursements for temporary office-rent elsewhere than at the place of their general office, for clerk-hire, traveling and incidental expenses.

Verily there are "millions in it," and no one is eligible to these fat offices but lawyers. I am not surprised that these attorneys in New York, Mr. Wise and others, have been enabled to create this artificial demand for the passage of a new bankrupt law. While it curses the country it will bless them.

Mr. Speaker, the testimony of the people of the United States, whenever authentically given, has been overwhelming against all bankrupt laws. In a hundred years of national life we have had but three bankrupt laws. The first bill, as we know, was passed in 1800; and although by its terms it was to last five years, it was in a little over half that period repudiated by the American people. Though passed as a party measure, the evils of its operations were so evident that party hostilities were suspended, and by a vote of 99 to 13 the obnoxious law was stricken from the statute-book. The next bankrupt law passed in 1841. Financial ruin, universal depression, and demoralization followed, and at the expiration of thirteen months after its passage popular indignation compelled its repeal by the same Congress and the same party that had passed it. The last experiment of this kind—the law of 1867, of which the present bill is practically a reproduction—was four times in four years prior to its overthrow condemned by this House in propositions of repeal which were rejected in the Senate, and finally it went to its grave with the execration of all our people—a grave which it was then hoped would have no resurrection day.

What, now, is this bill? It is, as I have said, but a reproduction of the law of 1867, and its amendments, which was in its turn substantially a copy of the English acts of 1861 and 1869. The changes are only in details. It is in substance the measure which only three years ago was repudiated by the British Parliament when the gentleman who had introduced it, and whose words I have before me, declared that it had proved an utter failure, a disgrace to the statute-book; that creditors received nothing under it; that the assets of bankrupts were all consumed in the expenses of officers. I quote here from an able memorial upon this subject of the Louisville Board of Trade:

Still another experiment followed—the elaborate bankruptcy act of 1869—which was claimed to be a certain solution of the problem, and one that would revive lost faith in bankrupt laws. We are told that "experience has not proved its wisdom. Insolvencies were not less frequent, nor less expensive, and not less fraudulent than before," and we are told that "the results of the English bankrupt act of 1869 are declared to be an enormous increase of insolvencies and deterioration of their character, excessive expenses, a great facility for fraud."

The result was, in England, the repeal of the act of 1869 and the passage of still another bankrupt act in 1883, containing one hundred and seventy separate sections. It is the last despairing attempt in England to establish a bankrupt law. By its terms the regulation of bankrupt estates is now made a governmental matter, and all bankrupt affairs are placed under the control of a government department and state regulations. The creditors and debtors are no longer the chief objects of consideration, but the state. By it, too, a man who has been adjudged a bankrupt is made very much like a criminal, for it provides that an undischarged bankrupt should be no longer capable of holding any municipal or local government office, and that he shall also be criminally liable if he obtains credit to the extent of $100 without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt. In short, the act makes him a sort of "ticket-of-leave man."

In a paper read in November last before the Bankers' Institute of England Mr. M. D. Chalmers, who was one of the draughtsmen of the act of 1883, said, in substance:

"The present act makes an entirely new departure, and places all the bankrupt affairs under the control of a government department; so that our bankruptcy machinery is now very largely a matter of state regulation. This new experiment is practically the last that can be made. We will all watch eagerly the workings of this new experiment, which must for good or evil have a great effect upon the commercial interests of the country. If the experiment succeeds in the main, amendments in detail, which the practical working of the measure would suggest, would no doubt be introduced. If it fails, like its predecessors, nearly everything in the shape of a bankrupt law will have been tried, and we will be brought face to face with the last alternative, the abolition of all bankrupt laws." (See his remarks quoted from Whitehall Review, printed in the Public Opinion of 1st December, 1883.)

In his debate upon the passage of this act, Mr. Chamberlain, the president of the English board of trade, said:

"The history of bankruptcy legislation of England is a history calculated to depress and discourage. It was composed of continual changes, vacillations, and disappointments."

Speaking of the English act of 1869 (from which the Lowell act now before Congress is substantially copied), he said:

"The present law gives facilities for evasions, extravagance, and delay. We lose by the bankrupt law twenty-five millions of pounds a year."

Lord Sherbrooke said of the proposed act of 1883:

"The attention which I have been able to give to it does not encourage me to believe in its healing virtue, and there is but little probability that this new scheme laid on the table of the house of commons will redress the evils of a system which has for many centuries baffled the effort and mocked the industry of mankind."

The fundamental defect is inherent in the very nature of all bankrupt laws. Proceedings in bankruptcy are of necessity nearly always ex parte; and in all ex parte proceedings somebody's interests are sure to be sacrificed. In bankruptcy matters the officers of the courts are present and the creditors are absent. Hence the creditors are the victims.

"From the shield of Achilles till the present time," said Lord Sherbrooke, "the only litigation which has really worked successfully has been that which is carried on between two parties representing thoroughly hostile and conflicting interests. One great and fatal weakness in a court of bankruptcy is that this conflict is wanting. The question is not as to the decision of the battle but as to the quantum of the loss. The court of bankruptcy is a forum in which there are no litigants, and to which, therefore, the machinery of a court is obviously inapplicable."

We are now asked to take this discarded English bill of 1869 and ingraft it upon the living law of our country. Why, sir, this bill can not claim to meet the requirement of the Constitution, for it is not a "uniform" bill. Talk about "uniformity" in a bill that incorporates within it all the exemption laws of every State of this Union—a bill which embraces a three-thousand-dollar exemption for Arkansas, a five-thousand-dollar exemption for California, and a thousand-dollar exemption for Kentucky, all being made a part of this "uniform" law (see the forty-third section)—the decisions of the State courts at the same time controlling the action of the registers and commissioners! How can a bill the provisions of which in reference to different States are as diverse as the escutcheons over our heads be called "uniform?" It is "uniform" only in accomplishing the withdrawal from creditors of the money justly their due and distributing it among the officials charged with its execution.

Mr. Speaker, I predict here to-day if this House pass this bill, and consideration in this case means its passage—let not gentlemen deceive themselves on that point—if you vote to-day to consider this bill you vote to pass it, because if you have two-thirds to consider, you will have a majority to pass it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Of course.

Mr. WILLIS. And I predict here to-day if you pass this bill these 5,000 officials, these 325 commissioners, one for each Congressional district, these registers, assignees, marshals, messengers, clerks, &c., will hardly have begun their infamous despoiling of the people again before a cry will come up from all quarters of this country as it came up before demanding of Congress the repeal of the law.

If I had time I could go through section by section of this bill and show that it is worse than the old bill. It is worse because in the 1867 bill it was only commercial paper, but under this bill any merchant who fails to pay an open account for thirty days is declared a bankrupt, thus giving the law a wider and more merciless action. Not only that, but in its provisions it is infinitely worse than the bill of 1867. There is no clause of this bill preventing repeated bankruptcies. In the old bill on second appeal for bankruptcy a man must pay thirty cents on the dollar. There is no provision of that kind in this bill. It thus unites and encourages repudiation.

It is an incitement and perpetual allurement to fraud. It is a temptation to that wild and reckless speculation which has caused so many of our people to lay their hands on sacred trust funds, to become forgetful of fiduciary responsibility to the dishonor of themselves and the ruin of those whose confidence they had betrayed.

Pass this bill, and you invite again a saturnalia of hazardous speculation. You open wide the door to your Enos and other defaulting and embezzling cashiers of the land. You say to them all: Go on with your fraud and your infamy, and this benignant law, through its greedy ministers, will treat and meet you with a welcome hearty in proportion to the amount you succeed in stealing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is now entitled to the floor, and has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, in the four minutes at my disposal I can not hope to discuss the merits of this bill, but I serve the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] with fair notice that if he and our other adversaries are fair-minded enough to give us a chance to discuss the merits of this measure I shall take the contract to convert him to our side.

I can not even hope in these four minutes to reconcile the differences between its opponents who have the power to-day as they did on the 19th of May last to vote in opposition to the consideration of this bill. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] says it does not make any difference if we pass this resolution, for we can not pass the bill, as we can not reach it in time. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] says that if the House shall vote to consider the bill it means its passage. I hope he is right, and I will take the risk so far as the gentleman from Georgia is concerned.

If I did not know my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to be a moderately truthful man I would venture the assertion he had not read the bill or looked at the index.

Mr. WILLIS. I have heard that before.

Mr. COLLINS. He says he has heard that remark before. Yes, and I make it again. I do not know where the gentleman from Kentucky gets his 5,000 office-holders. If this bill shall become a law no more than three hundred new offices can be created—and the officers are not to be paid by the United States, but to be paid out of the estates of those who take advantage of the bankrupt act.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] says more money is collected to-day in the absence of a bankrupt law than there was collected before. Why? When the act of 1867 was passed it was for the purpose of relieving the people, who did not have anything except a load of debt to carry, and people go into bankruptcy only as a last resort.

My friend from Kentucky again refers to the English bankruptcy act and says it is not a good law. The boards of trade of England, the merchants of England, the courts of England, are all against him. I hold in my hand from the Pall Mall Gazette an article which shows the admirable working of the present English bankrupt law.

Mr. WILLIS. Last year.

Mr. COLLINS. The last bankrupt act of England, and it is based on the principles of this very bill. My friend from Kentucky is talking ancient history when he is talking about the ill-working of the English bankrupt act. I have compared the last English act with the present and every other bill, and it is based on the principles of the Lowell bill.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] says it is asked for by interested parties. Ay, by parties interested in the honest collection of debts as well as by the traders and farmers of the land.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And of the honest merchants.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; in the interest of the honest merchants, the traders, the farmers, and the men who labor; all are interested that the debtor shall yield his assets to be ratably distributed among his creditors to whom they belong, and that he shall be relieved of the burden resting upon him and allow him to resume his travels in the channels of trade free from an incumbrance. I am interested in that, and I wish the gentleman from Kentucky and the other opponents of the bill were interested in it also.

I ask unanimous consent now to print, as a part of my remarks, this article from the Pall Mall Gazette to which I have referred, showing the workings of the present English bankrupt law; and as we have had the courtesy not to object to the other side, I renew the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] that the memorial to which he referred during the course of his remarks be also printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without the names.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; without the names.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The extract referred to by Mr. COLLINS is as follows:

WORKINGS OF THE ENGLISH BANKRUPTCY ACT.

We are indebted to the Pall Mall Gazette for the following:

"The net gain under the new bankruptcy act can be summed up in a paragraph, but it is felt throughout the whole country. Under the act of 1869 the law costs averaged 37 per cent. in cases of bankruptcy and 36½ per cent. in cases of liquidation, while under Mr. Chamberlain's act they only average 12 per cent. At one stroke, therefore, 25 per cent. of the assets have been saved from the lawyers and accountants and rendered available for distribution among the creditors. It was bad enough for the creditor to lose half his money owing to the impecuniosity of the debtor, but it was worse to have 37 per cent. of the residuum devoured by the rapacity of the lawyers.

"But that is only a small part of the boon conferred upon the trading community by the new act. It has acted as a great deterrent to fraudulent bankruptcies. The number of bankruptcies this year up to October 11 was 5,223 below that of the corresponding period in last year. The decrease has been nearly 60 per cent., a great and notable diminution indeed. At first it was believed that this was due to the making of private arrangements behind the act. It is quite true that the worshipful fraternity of accountants and bankruptcy lawyers did their utmost to effect such arrangements. But they failed, failed utterly and ignominiously, and we have in the diminished number of bankruptcies a fair index to the diminution effected in the number of debtors who try to cheat their creditors. That is a remarkable change to have effected, and while the air is still ringing with Carlyle's denunciations of dishonesty and roguery of this decadent generation it is well to remember that this is the notablest stroke that has yet been dealt at 'swindling by statute.'

"That is good; but that is not all. Not only have 25 per cent. of the assets been saved to the creditors, not only have the number of bankruptcies been reduced in ten months by 5,223, but in places where private compositions have been accepted by creditors so great is the dread excited by public examination of debtors that the amount of the composition has risen all round. In one district in the west of England it is reported that compositions of 10s. and 15s. in the pound are now the rule. Thus, both directly and indirectly, the act has operated most beneficially in securing the payment of debts and in preventing the swindling of honest men.

"So remarkable have been the results obtained by the operation of Mr. Chamberlain's act that even such a sworn enemy of the new law as the Standard has admitted that the cost of official administration is much less; that the dividends are much greater; that the lawyers' fees are saved, and that estates are much more promptly realized. But the crowning proof of the success of the act is afforded by the circular of the association for its repeal or amendment. This circular sets forth with thinly veiled frankness the real motives of those who alone question the reality of Mr. Chamberlain's success. "Bankruptcy practitioners" have set the thing on foot with the following objects:

"1. To amend the rules and scales of fees and curtail the powers of the board of trade.

"2. To obtain the legal recognition of arrangements between debtor and creditor without the necessity of recourse to absolute bankruptcy—which means the avoidance of examination on oath and the taxing of solicitors' bills.

"3. To protect encroachment on bankruptcy practitioners, and to protect trustees against the unfair retrospective clauses of the present act—which being interpreted means that the board of trade is no longer to compel trustees to account for funds which they have misapplied.

"4. To obtain an increase in the scales of remuneration to solicitors, trustees, &c.; which needs no explanation.

"The bankruptcy act must, indeed, have been a great success when the worst that can be said against it is that it must be amended, not in the interest of the creditor, but solely in the interest of those who have fattened on the creditor for years past."

The petition referred to by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, is as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of Cook County, State of Illinois, engaged in mercantile, manufacturing, and other business avocations, believing that a uniform system of bankruptcy in the several States, under a national bankrupt act that shall be equitable in respect to the creditor and debtor classes and economical in its administrative provisions, would tend to impart stability to commercial interests and contribute to the maintenance of soundness in business affairs, respectfully, but earnestly, petition your honorable bodies to take early action favorable to the enactment of such a law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which has been read.

Mr. FUNSTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FUNSTON. I wish to ask whether this order, if adopted, will supersede other special orders with which it comes in conflict?

The SPEAKER. That is scarcely an inquiry now to be addressed to the Chair. The resolution itself exempts certain characters of business; but it is always in order for the House to determine whether it will or will not take up even a special order.

The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. NEECE. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 136, nays 75, not voting 112; as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BAGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. PUSEY, on the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HOUK, on this vote.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. HOLTON, for this day.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, on this question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment for a motion to take from the Speaker's table the House bill making temporary appropriations for the Navy for thirty-one days, with Senate amendments thereto, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7791) making temporary provision for the naval service.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 23, 1884.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendment.

There being no objection, the bill, with the Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONGO CONFERENCE AT BERLIN.

Mr. BELMONT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House in respect to all the negotiations or arrangements (if in his opinion such information will not be incompatible with the public interests) between this Government and any other government or governments which led up to the Congo conference at Berlin, and the motives or purposes with which this Government consented to participate therein. And also that the President cause to be transmitted to this House a copy of all correspondence between this Government and other governments relating to the Congo conference, together with the names of those who have been authorized by this Government to act as its delegates or plenipotentiaries thereat, the text of the credentials or powers given to such representatives of the United States, and a copy of all dispatches, reports, or other communications received by this Government from its representatives at the conference. And that the President, if he shall inform this House of the precise objects and purposes with which this Government was represented in the conference, will also inform the House which, if any, of those objects or purposes have been accomplished, and also whether or not any of the opinions or purposes of this Government, or its delegates or plenipotentiaries, as set forth in such conference, was resisted in the conference by any of the governments represented there; and, if so, by which of the governments, on what points, for what reasons, and with what results.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but there is a motion for adjournment pending.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will withdraw the motion on account of the importunities of gentlemen around me.

PUBLIC BUILDING, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 1339, now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a bill to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Pittsburgh, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building by the United States Government at Pittsburgh, Pa., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $1,500,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of said building.

SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making contracts for the erection of said building.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What has become of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I renew it.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th ultimo, a letter of the Acting Chief of Engineers, submitting a report of Lieut. Col. H. M. Robert, Corps of Engineers, regarding the extent of the damage done to the United States breakwater in the harbor of Oswego, N. Y., by the recent gale there, and the amount necessary for its reparation; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in reference to a previous communication from him on the subject of increased appropriations to be expended in the defense of suits brought in the Court of Claims in consequence of the large number of claims referred to that court by the two Houses of Congress, and stating that the sum appropriated is entirely inadequate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with law, a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting the report of the commission appointed under the act of July 4, 1884, to examine into and report upon the character, extent, &c., of the coal on the White Mountain Indian reservation in the Territory of Arizona; which, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 23d ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs regarding the appraisement of and price paid for certain Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River; which, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 17th ultimo, a report regarding the leasing of lands for grazing purposes upon the Crow Indian reservation in Montana Territory, and also a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and copies of all correspondence since the report of March 25, 1884, relating thereto; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, in answer to a resolution of the 3d ultimo, a report regarding the leasing of lands in the Indian Territory or Indian reservations for grazing and other purposes by the tribes of Indians therein, with a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and other correspondence upon the subject.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, and was interrupted by—

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the further reading of this document be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD. It is very long, I see, and the subject is now under consideration by the Committee on Indian Affairs, who will have access to the communication.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if he would not as lief have it printed as an ordinary document, instead of being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. INGALLS. I think that would be better.

Mr. DAWES. Of course this will be printed as an ordinary document. It occurred to me, however, that it might be interesting enough for Senators to see in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have made up my mind, after the speech made the other day by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that if other Senators will join me I shall try to keep out of the RECORD everything but what transpires here; and if all Senators are willing to stand by that we shall be able to shorten the RECORD, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. DAWES. I think this paper should be an exception. It is a large document and it will be some days before we can get it from the Printer. The Committee on Indian Affairs are now in session, morning and evening, examining the matter that is committed to them, and it will be very desirable for them to see this document soon. It contains information that will be of value to us in the investigation. I have no desire beyond that myself. Otherwise I should not care to see it in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say further, and it may as well be understood, that whenever there is anything of importance to be printed immediately, all that is necessary is for the Secretary to say so, and it can be printed in three hours instead of three months. It is entirely a matter of discretion with the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I was under the impression that it would be several days before the printing could be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator desires to have it printed promptly, I have no doubt by having that suggested to the Secretary he can have it printed by to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose what has been read will not go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No part of it will go into the RECORD, the Chair understands. If there be no objection, the letter of the Secretary of the Interior will be printed and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Chair has not suggested an order to print the voluminous package accompanying the letter, thinking that the Committee on Indian Affairs might examine it first to see whether it should all be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I hope it will all be printed, and I hope the Secretary will have it printed by to-morrow morning if possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the accompanying documents be printed. If there be no objection, that order will be entered. It will be so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Daniel G. Eldridge, of Sanborn, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act granting him a pension on account of disabilities incurred in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL. I present the petition of William B. Hatch Post, No. 37, Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the publication of photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion. These petitions seem to have been prepared with a view of having them referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but I think it will be more appropriate, in view of the fact that they relate to the question of printing connected with public documents, that they should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Similar petitions have been referred to the Committee on Printing. The petition now presented will be so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a communication addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations from certain merchants in the city of New York, in favor of the ratification of the pending treaty of commerce with Spain. I desire to have it received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks leave to submit a document addressed to him on the subject of the reciprocity treaty, so called, with Spain. If there be no objection, it will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a memorial of cigar-manufacturers of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of cigar-makers of Aurora, Ill., and a memorial of cigar-makers of Havana, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented the petition of Wilbur F. Hendrick, late a private in Company B, Tenth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of F. Weiss, ex-colonel Twentieth Regiment New York Volunteers, and the petition of Oatman Covill, late a private in Company M, Second New York Volunteers, praying for an extension of the time for filing pension claims; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of cigar-makers of Elmira and Albany, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Maryland, officially signed, representing nine hundred members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DOLPH presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., in favor of the establishment of a United States assay office at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOWEN presented the petition of George N. Marden, of Colorado Springs, Colo., praying compensation for certain lands owned by him in the District of Columbia, alleged to have been taken by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of John A. Andrew Post, No. 15, Department of Massachusetts, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the publication of certain photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PIKE presented memorials of cigar-packers of New York and the New York Leaf-Tobacco Board of Trade, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAWLEY presented memorials of cigar-makers of Hartford and Danbury, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a memorial of leaf dealers, cigar manufacturers, and cigar-makers of Minnesota, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1154) to increase the pension of Anne S. Mellach, to submit an adverse report thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1175) granting a pension to Anna M. Smith; and

A bill (S. 1789) for the relief of John O. Donald.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6282) to place the name of R. W. Duncan on the pension-roll; and

A bill (H. R. 4041) restoring the name of Zelica T. Dunlap to the pension-roll.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2200) to place the name of R. W. Duncan on the pension-roll, reported it without recommendation, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 585) granting a pension to John B. Tibbetts; and

A bill (S. 2322) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Abbett.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of the Texas navy, and the bill (S. 1042) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of Texas, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector of the port at New York to deliver, free of duty, a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen as a member of the American rifle team at Wimbledon in July, 1883, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5747) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Larned, Kans., not to exceed $250,000, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 619) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage duties, to report it adversely. I will state that a bill was formerly passed to pay these parties the principal of the sum claimed, and this appears to be a bill in favor of paying the interest on the sum to the several parties, which the Government has always refused to do. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5500) for the relief of Benjamin F. Amos, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1791) granting a pension to David G. Porter;

A bill (H. R. 1142) granting a pension to Nelly Roberts; and

A bill (S. 752) granting an increase of pension to Joshua M. Ash.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 930) granting a pension to Geriah Collins, to report it adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5962) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza Hicks, to report it adversely. I believe the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires to have this bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to allow the bill to go on the Calendar for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The bill will go on the Calendar with the adverse report, if there is no objection.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Sidney L. Skaggs, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2327) for the relief of James Bedell, sr., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Frank Schwartz;

A bill (H. R. 3023) granting an increase of pension to John Dwyer; and

A bill (S. 960) granting an increase of pension to Ann H. Cunningham.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5004) for the relief of William B. Smith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Anderson Winfrey, of Carrollton, Mo., praying for reimbursement of expenditures for recruits for the Forty-fourth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, with affidavits of Henry C. Manning, William N. Waters, and John T. Patton, to report it back to the Senate, and to ask that the petition be laid on the table, that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the claimant be given leave to withdraw the affidavits of Henry C. Manning, W. N. Waters, and John T. Patton, which have been filed in the case, there being no adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, the petition will lie upon the table, and the claimant will have leave to withdraw the papers suggested, if there is no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 263) for the relief of George F. Bicknell, to report it back to the Senate, recommending that no action be had upon the bill, that the bill be laid upon the table, and that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of War to remove the charge of dismissal from the records of the War Department standing against Captain Bicknell. There is no charge of dismissal on the records of the War Department. He tendered his resignation and it was duly accepted. The officers in forwarding the resignation expressed their opinions in regard to him as an officer. The committee decide that it has no jurisdiction to revise or correct or erase the voluntary expressions of opinion by the officers when they indorsed the application for resignation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be discharged and the bill will lie on the table, if there is no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2426) to empower the President to reappoint not more than two persons as first lieutenants in the Army, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and reported as a substitute therefor a bill (S. 2495) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5713) to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1389) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that that is not the report of all the members of the Committee on Military Affairs. There are some who are opposed to the report, among whom I am one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2496) for the relief of John F. Riley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2497) for the relief of John Daily; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2498) to establish an international copyright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2499) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Fort Robinson military reservation in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2500) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Ringgold; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2501) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah S. Sampson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2502) granting a pension to Jesse C. Osgood; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2503) for the relief of Charles E. Maris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2504) to remove the charge of desertion against Miner Ellis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 2505) for the relief of certain laborers, workmen, and mechanics heretofore and at present employed at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. INGALLS. On the 4th of December, 1883, I introduced Senate bill No. 1, to amend section 2 of "an act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879. This bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions. They have had it in their possession and custody now for thirteen months, which in my opinion is sufficiently long for them to have been able to make up their judgment as to the propriety of the passage or of the rejection of the bill. For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate upon the proposition, I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. I am aware that under the rules a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of any subject must lie over one day. I will therefore consent, unless there is some objection on the part of the chairman of the committee, that the motion may lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to the Senate considering the motion at this time, if it so desires; but the whole subject was gone over, as the world knows, at the last session of Congress by the Senate, and adverse action was taken upon the Senator's proposition by the Senate. The Senator from Kansas moved to the bill known as the Mexican pension bill an amendment which covered the whole subject. I favored the proposition at that time. Some Senators on this side took a different view of it; I guess all those on the other side took a different view; and the amendment was voted down. The Committee on Pensions intended to dispose of the bill formally, but it is a mere formality; and if the Senate desires to dispose of it in this way there is no objection on the part of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill the title of which will be now reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1) to amend section 2 of an act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1879."

Mr. MITCHELL. At the suggestion of Senators near me I ask that the motion may lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion will go over until to-morrow. It is so ordered.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been considered as in Committee of the Whole and has been reported to the Senate. The pending question is on a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw that motion. I made the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to recommit is withdrawn by the mover. The bill is still open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the amendments be read which have been adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill has been amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu of the matter stricken out:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the lands granted by an act of Congress entitled "An act granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, as are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general land laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made.

SEC. 2. That all persons who at the date of the passage of this act are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited, and who are otherwise qualified, on making due claim to such lands under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, within six months after the same shall have been declared forfeited, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, as the case may be, and shall be regarded as having legally settled upon and occupied said lands under said pre-emption, homestead, or other laws, as the case may be, from the date of such actual settlement or occupation; and in case any such settler may not be entitled to thus enter or acquire such land under existing laws, he shall be permitted, within one year after the passage of this act, to purchase not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres of the same, at the price of $1.25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as will secure to said actual settlers the benefit of these rights: Provided, That the price of the even-numbered sections within the limits of said grant and adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road, is hereby reduced to $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 3. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits," is hereby repealed.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "as though said grant had never been made" where they occur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 13, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out the words "as though said grant had never been made."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion is not in order, the words proposed to be stricken out being in an amendment which was agreed to by the Senate after the bill had been considered as in Committee of the Whole. The motion, therefore, is to strike out words that the Senate has by its vote inserted.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not catch the last remark of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator is to strike out words that the Senate by a previous vote has inserted in the bill, and the Chair thinks therefore the motion is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I had the impression that those words were in the bill as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are in the amendment agreed to in the Senate, the Chair finds on inspection of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the motion to strike out those words shall be considered in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the motion be considered as in order. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLPH. Before determining whether there is objection on my part, I should like to have the section read in connection with the words proposed to be stricken out, so that I may understand the purport of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read in connection as if the amendment were now proposed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the lands granted by an act of Congress entitled "An act granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, as are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general land laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Alabama is to strike out the words indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SLATER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon on the right of the Chair objects. The Chair overrules the motion as being not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have desired that the Senate should have an opportunity to consider this bill on its merits. The two Senators from Oregon seem to have agreed that the bill shall become a law, and I suppose that the rest of us are necessitated from the circumstances to stand by and see them have their own pleasure with this railway grant.

The feature to which I have just called the attention of the Senate is a very radical form of legislation upon anybody's property or anybody's claim of property, and the Senate it seems to me ought not to pass a bill which embodies the principle contained in those words as well as in other words found in this measure. The subject of the forfeiture of land grants to railroads is one that has attracted no attention particularly from Congress, in the nature of debate and close examination, until a recent period. It has recently become, it appears, the sentiment of the two great political parties in this country that railroad corporations should be raided, and their bondholders also, for the purpose of repairing some supposed injuries that have been inflicted on the country by the action of our predecessors in Congress, and for the purpose of gratifying the wishes of those persons who have settled on the public lands in contravention of law in various parts of the Western country.

When these railroad land grants were made it was not really within the expectation of Congress that the grantees would all be able to comply with the terms and conditions of the grants precisely as they were made. Consequently when the period for forfeiture had arrived, because these railroads were not completed within the time prescribed by these several statutes, Congress was very quiescent, and permitted the railroad companies to proceed with their work and bondholders to invest money in these roads precisely as if the grant was in all respects valid, subsisting, and continuing, and the roads were expected to be entirely completed to the satisfaction of the people.

In this period of inaction on the part of Congress rights have sprung up in favor of third persons who aver—whether that averment is true or not it is not for me to say—that they were induced to make investments of this kind upon the idea that so long as these companies were prosecuting their efforts to complete their roads to their terminal points the Government would acquiesce in maintaining the land grants and whatever other privileges had been granted to them for this purpose. In this way rights have sprung up in favor of individuals founded upon the belief that Congress would always deal equitably with them in regard to these great public trusts. Those persons were before the committees of this body by their counsel for the purpose of insisting upon their rights, and they complain most bitterly that, after the lapse of years and after by our acquiescence we have induced them to invest their money in these enterprises, we now seize and confiscate their property without giving them an opportunity to be heard in the Federal courts.

Sir, I have sympathized with the movement which would compel the railroad corporations to return to the public domain all the lands that they had not honestly earned, or had not shown a sufficient capacity or purpose to continue to strive to earn. I have therefore voted for these land-grant forfeitures, but in doing so I have attempted to provide in this case, as we have provided in every other case of forfeiture in the history of the United States, that there should be some judicial ascertainment of the rights of the parties whose property is to be confiscated or condemned to forfeiture. I use the term "confiscate" because that is an apt term to express the exact situation.

I have been acquainted with some of the confiscating laws of this country. I have seen something of their operations, and long before I came to the Senate of the United States, while practicing as a lawyer at the bar, I acquired a sufficient knowledge of the application of this system of laws to private rights and private property to be put very much upon the alert after I arrived here in giving my sanction as a Senator to any system of confiscation if it could be avoided at all fairly and honorably, and particularly to that sort of confiscation which makes the act of seizure the act of expropriation.

Sir, we have systems of laws relating to confiscation for various causes. Sometimes they are called confiscations, sometimes they are called forfeitures, sometimes they are called penalties. Our system of laws in this respect has been derived from the practical experience of our ancestors in England and in this country for centuries back. Wise lawmakers and wise judges have not found it necessary to be more conservative and more cautious in the administration of any system of laws that prevailed in England than those which relate to penalties and forfeitures and confiscations. So necessary was it considered to protect the people against the arbitrary power of confiscation that we introduced into our Constitution certain guarantees of a personal character to protect the people against the power of the judges or of the Legislature in matters of this kind.

How many classes of forfeitures have we in the United States to-day? We have a very large list of them that relate to the collection of the revenue through the customs and the breach of the internal-revenue laws. We have another large list of them, not entirely obsolete as yet, that relate to the conduct of persons in the late rebellion. We have some which relate to church property in the Territories. Where a church in a Territory shall acquire a property exceeding $50,000 in value the surplus is made liable to escheat to the Government of the United States. We have various other kinds of forfeitures and confiscations and penalties, all belonging to the same generic family, but differing in their variety.

Now let me ask the Senate, has it ever shamed the statutes of this country before by declaring any forfeiture whatever without giving the party an opportunity to go into a Federal court to have it determined whether the seizure made was a lawful seizure or not? Has that thing ever before occurred? I said, sir, that I had witnessed the operation of the confiscation laws, and I have a reason to speak with strong approval of the generosity of the United States Government in dealing with men whose property it had declared confiscated or confiscable for insurrection and rebellion during the war. Here was a nation divided against itself; here were warring States and people; here was the very bitterest acrimony that has ever yet sprung from a civil war in its full tide of vicious innovations; here was every stimulus that could excite a people to seize, to convert, to destroy, to appropriate what belonged to the enemies (as we were termed) of the Government of the United States; and traitors besides they called us. In the midst of that fearful war, when the acts of confiscation were passed in respect to the property of the Southern people, the Government of the United States would not permit the property of any citizen to be confiscated except through the judgment of a court. That was a proud record, sir, and I am glad to be able to stand upon the floor of the Senate of the United States to-day, and to bear testimony to the equanimity of the people of the United States in the respective bodies of their great Congress in the enactment of the provision of law that seizures made during the war for the cause of rebellion should be carried into court before they could be disposed of.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to hear the Senator upon one point. If the land-grant railroad companies have vested rights in the grants of land, could any act of Congress declare them forfeited and divest them of those rights? Would not they be free to assert their rights in court without any legislation on that subject? In other words, take the act of Congress to which the Senator alludes that was applied to his own part of the country. I know a great many instances where the rights of parties were not divested and were so declared by the courts afterward and the property was restored, and as far as I have looked into this matter, it has not occurred to me that we could by declaring the land-grant forfeiture divest the railroad company of any legal right it may have.

Mr. MORGAN. The question of the Senator from Indiana only needs an answer as to the latter branch of it, and that is as to the remedy to be provided for the purpose of asserting the title that has been assailed by an act of forfeiture here. In the first part of the question I concur with the Senator; and that is that a mere declaration of forfeiture by act of Congress does not divest the property of any citizen of the United States; and yet this bill was intended to have that effect. If this bill does not have that effect, it will disappoint its authors, it will disappoint the gentlemen who are urging it through the Senate. And if it does not have the effect of relegating this land back to the public domain without giving to any person an opportunity to question our right to do it, these gentlemen will be disappointed. The language of the bill is framed for that purpose. That is its object and that is its intention throughout, and I leave it precisely as I understand it to be intended——

Mr. SLATER. I should like to interrupt the Senator with his permission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, we are only asking in this bill for compliance with the conditions of the contract and of the grant. The railroad company agreed, under the enactment of Congress, to build this road within a specified time. The act itself said that if they did not complete it within a certain time they should not have even the evidence of title—a patent. We are asking nothing but what the railroad grant proposed we should ask, after eight years absolute silence on the part of the company so far as any act is concerned. We do not expect to touch any right which has been acquired by the company. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am very far from being mistaken in any respect about it. I was speaking exactly upon the record, and exactly in reference to a state of facts that no man can dispute. The title to this land is conceded on all hands to be in this railroad company at this moment. I do not know that I could strengthen that proposition by restating it, or by arguing it, or by attempting to intensify it at all. But there is no Senator on this floor, including both the Senators from Oregon, who is not prepared to admit, and is not compelled to admit, that at this moment of time the title to this land is in the railroad company, a perfect title, subject to be divested by no other person than by the United States Government claiming the right of forfeiture.

Mr. DOLPH. If that constitutes a perfect title, then I agree with the Senator. I suppose that would not constitute a perfect title.

Mr. MORGAN. A perfect title, as I remarked, Mr. President, subject to be divested only by the Government of the United States for the cause of forfeiture alleged or stated in the act making the grant and in accordance with law as I contend. That being the situation, this railroad company having a perfect title as to every person in the world except the United States Government, it has a property in this land which we are bound to respect. Every man in the United States is bound to respect it, unless it may be the Congress of the United States.

It having a perfect title of this kind, what is sought to be done? Not to get the assistance of the judiciary to determine upon the facts and the law whether there is a forfeiture and whether that forfeiture carries the estate back to the Government of the United States; that is not what is sought to be done, but it is by virtue of an act of Congress operating directly and of its own force to seize this title, transfer it to the Government of the United States, conclude all people against questioning it, hold it there forfeited, confiscated without trial. Sir, I am opposed to that principle of legislation. I know, as the Senator from Indiana who put the question to me a moment ago knows, and as every Senator here knows, that the Congress of the United States can not by act of legislation take property out of the hands of a citizen of this country and appropriate it to itself or to the Government of the United States. They can not do it. They would not do it even as to parties in rebellion; they would not do it when the heat of war was upon the country and there was every incentive and inducement to make confiscations out of hand. No, sir; they paused on that ground which has respect for personal rights, recognized by our English ancestry and by the colonial fathers, as also by the founders of this great Government of ours—they paused upon that ground, and they ordained that the act to be performed by the United States in a case of that kind should only be an act of the seizure of property and then that it should be taken into court to be there condemned.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama to state that the title of this railroad company to the whole extent of this grant is perfect and absolute?

Mr. MORGAN. Until the United States Government takes advantage of the forfeiture, if the condition subsequent has been broken.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then you say it is not perfect.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not say either way.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am asking you——

Mr. MORGAN. No. The alert mind of the Senator gets around me and puts me in a false attitude.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir. I understood the Senator to state distinctly that the title of the railroad company to this grant was perfect and absolute, and then I propounded the question.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator did not understand me; that is all. I beg the Senator when he does not understand me not to interrupt me.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I want to understand you. Then I propounded the question whether the Senator does state or mean to state that the title is absolute to the land conveyed within this grant.

Mr. MORGAN. I say there is a perfect title in this railroad company against every person in the world except the United States.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Except the owner.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not say "the owner."

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then the gentleman has qualified his original statement.

Mr. MORGAN. And it is perfect as against the United States to-day if it should bring an action of ejectment to recover it from the defendant. Will that satisfy the Senator?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; not exactly. I desire to know the Senator's legal proposition in regard to this matter.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been trying to state my legal proposition.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not that I will take the opportunity to antagonize it now, but I desire to know where he stands, so that the position may be stated as the courts have stated it, and as the Congress of the United States have claimed, that the title is not absolute, that in this land the Government of the United States retains not only the title but the possession of the land until the railroad company has earned it by completing the road, and then it becomes entitled by patent to the land.

Mr. MORGAN. I am aware that since the honorable gentleman had the misfortune to have a controversy about some of those lands before the Supreme Court of the United States he has no respect for its decisions, but I must be controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Right there, Mr. President, I wish to say that that is what I am desiring the Senator from Alabama to do. I want to present to him squarely the decision of the Supreme Court on this question. If he takes the position that the title of the railroad company is perfect and absolute, then he antagonizes, as I will show at another time, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I beg him to yield peculiar reverence to the decisions of the Supreme Court when they happen to be in conflict with the claim of the friends of railroad organizations.

Mr. MORGAN. The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman has been quoted so frequently that I suppose the pages around the Senate Chamber must understand it perfectly well. The Senator from Nebraska seems to think it is his mission in life to fight Schulenberg vs. Harriman from this out. It will be a hard fight; I do not know who will win, but so far the Supreme Court is a little ahead. I am following the Supreme Court, which has decided that a grant precisely of the character, as I understand it, of the graft in question in this bill, was a grant in præsenti of the legal estate to the railroad company; that it passed every right and every title that the United States had in the land, subject only to be forfeited upon the breach of the condition subsequent. That is what I understand. If it is not a good title as against everybody but the United States, I do not understand what a good title is; and if it is not a good title as against the United States until the declaration of forfeiture, I do not understand what a good title is; and therefore I would maintain that if the railroad company had a tenant in occupation of any of this land, and the United States were to-day to try the title in an action of ejectment with that tenant, the tenant could set up that he held under this grant and under the railroad company, and would have a perfect title against the Government of the United States in the action of ejectment.

We have got something to do before we resume this title. What is that? We must have what is equivalent to office found under the British law; that is to say, we must have a repossession of the land either by an actual taking of possession or by a constructive legal possession; and we must do it in virtue of the sovereign power of this Government, exercised either through the Legislature or through the judiciary. But these conditions we must comply with before we can resume the title which we have granted out of us and which now rests in the railroad company. It seems to me that is a pretty clear proposition, and therefore if the Government of the United States were to sue a tenant in possession of this land, holding under this corporation to-day, in an action of ejectment, the forfeiture not having been declared, the proceedings to make the forfeiture perfect not having been executed or carried into effect, the title of the plaintiff would fail because it had granted the title out of itself. I do not think it takes a very wise man to see that. It seems to me that if there is any proposition settled in this country in the shape of law that is settled; and therefore I do not care to waste my time and strength in trying to debate horn-book law in this country, which everybody understands except the few gentlemen who do not want to understand anything about it.

Now, sir, how are we to get hold of this title? Shall we do it by an act of legislative confiscation? Shall we attempt to do it by an act of legislative confiscation, which the honorable Senator from Indiana foresees would be entirely unavailing? Shall we attempt to march over the ground that separates us from the domain of the judiciary, and usurp to ourselves the power of ultimate and final adjudication upon the rights of property of this railroad company? I maintain that we ought not to do it.

I have taken a position a little further in advance, just a little further in advance than that which has been taken and adhered to by the Judiciary Committee of this body after frequent and close and earnest investigations of this question. That committee in its previous recommendations upon several bills, as Senators will well remember, had asserted that it was the duty of the Government of the United States when proceeding to declare a forfeiture to go to the courts, and the duty of Congress to empower the courts to make the declaration. To go there as a suitor, to get a judge to declare the forfeiture; and I do not know but that the better opinion among the bar of the United States to-day is that that is the real duty of the Government whenever it seeks to declare a forfeiture of these lands. That it shall go as a suitor in the courts after having made a seizure of them, as they would in a case of confiscable property go into the courts and upon a libel filed, or whatever it is that you choose to use, ask the judge to declare a forfeiture as a matter of right.

I say that I have gone a little further than that. I have done it because I have conceived that the United States was not only a party to a contract in the enactment of these statutes, but that it was a lawmaker at the same time; that it was acting in a double capacity of making a law and also of making a contract when these grants were made, and that the Government, through its Congress, had the right to declare that that law had been violated, and that it was no longer, therefore, a shelter of protection to the claimant under its former grant. Perhaps the distinction is not a very palpable one; but perhaps more in deference to the eager earnestness of gentlemen who seem determined to wrest the property from the railroads I have gone with them, believing that many of these roads had forfeited their rights of property in these grants. So I have consented on my part to advocate the doctrine that Congress has the right to make a legislative declaration upon a question of this kind which will have all the effect of office-found under the English law, and will reinstate the United States in the possession of the land.

Now, sir, if that declaration has all that effect that is enough, and surely it is as far as we have any precedent for going. The British Parliament have never seen proper to condemn property out and out by a legislative enactment. They have always relied upon that ancient prerogative writ addressed by the king to the coroner that he would summon a jury in the first instance and have judicial procedure taken on the question of the right of the crown to repossess itself of lands. That government has always, in deference to the rights of its citizens and rights of property, maintained that attitude toward its people. It brings to me a sense of humiliation when I think that the British Government can be more just to British subjects than this free American Republic dares to be to its own people.

Whatever the process may be, whether it may be by a proceeding in court or whether it may be a legislative declaration, there is a limit to the effect of the declaration on the part of the Government of the United States. What can the Government of the United States do in this case? Not actually usurp to itself the title to these lands, but it can assert a claim in law to them and have it adjudicated and settled in accordance with law. Are we, while we are the lawmakers of this country, not to approve ourselves as law-abiding men? Have we a contempt for the rules of property and the rules of right that we enact continually as between man and man in this country? Have we the idea that when the Government of the United States asserts a title to a piece of property that assertion must be in the nature of a final and an effectual decree of divestiture of all rights on the part of the claimant? Have we got to that pitch that an American citizen as against his own Government has not the protection of the law, and that we can stand upon the floors of these Houses and in virtue of power delegated to us under a written constitution rob the very people who send us here and vote for us for these places? No, sir; I shall not be of that party. They may raise their clamors trumpet-tongued against me through every newspaper in the land, but I will still stand by the idea that the people of Alabama did not send me here as a judge to adjudicate the property of other people out of their hands, but as a lawmaker only, to represent the constitutional rights of the Government of the United States in such matters.

What is a confiscation? It is, first, the seizure of property by the Government because of the breach by the citizen of some law of the United States. What is to be done in order to ripen a confiscation into a title to the property adverse to the holder of it? After the seizure a proceeding must be had in a court. We say in this bill, "Here is a forfeiture of land for the breach of a contract, and we take that land and we reclaim it because the contract with us is broken." "Here is the property of a man in rebellion whose property is forfeited, not because he breaks a contract, but because he is guilty of an alleged crime of a high character." We take that man's property by an act of seizure merely, and we say to the Government of the United States, "Before you can condemn the property of this man that you have seized you must go into the courts and prove your case." If the Government of the United States, in order to preserve its constitutional duty toward the people, found it necessary to put into the law of confiscation for the crime of insurrection or rebellion this clause, that the Government after the seizure should follow the property into the courts, take it there, and there have it condemned, let me ask Senators how they can afford, where there is only an alleged breach of contract, to take the property and condemn it out and out? A government that for the protection of its own authority in respect to its own rebellious citizens refused to condemn their property, they being unheard, and finally to decide the title by a legislative enactment, comes in obedience to a popular clamor raised by men who have got votes to cast in the ballot-box, and dishonors itself by saying, "We will take the title to this land out and out because a contract has been broken."

Is there any public necessity, Mr. President, of an imminent and a dangerous character, to hasten the Congress of the United States on in this rapid course of seizure and confiscation in respect of the lands granted to any railroad company in this country? These lands are still there, and so far as they have been squatted upon they are still yielding subsistence and comfort to the men who have violated the law in getting upon them. They are not likely to run away or to be displaced in any way, and we have ample leisure in the circumstances surrounding these transactions to look carefully into our duty and not to violate the constitutional rights of anybody in our efforts to do justice to the people of the United States. There is no occasion for haste. We can very well afford to give ample time to the judiciary to say how far they have the right to judge of questions of this kind.

I come now to the next point, which will be an answer or an attempted answer to the last branch of the question put by the Senator from Indiana. We have no right, as the Senator and I agree, I have no doubt, to take these lands by a legislative decree and confiscate them, and to determine that the title is divested out of the corporation and invested in the United States. There must be some power of the courts to intervene and try that right, for while we may safely put ourselves in the attitude of the actual capture of the lands from our grantee, we never can put ourselves in the position of protection against the warrant from the court which shall call us to trial for it.

But, Mr. President, how is this trial to be had—and that is the whole question that is presented in this case—how is it to be had? How was it had in England? In England, as I have observed, the Crown issued a prerogative writ to a coroner. He summoned as many jurors as he pleased, not exceeding thirty I believe. They took an ex parte view of the case; they heard the Crown side of it, and they returned a verdict, which was certified to a court, that in consequence of the grant and the breach of the condition thereof by the defendant, which consisted of certain stated facts, the Crown had the right to reenter; and thereupon the King entered into possession as of his former title, precisely like a man could do who had made a grant upon a condition subsequent.

What next? Was the citizen concluded by this judicial proceeding to which he was not a party? By no means. What did he then do? He brought his writ of right or his bill in equity, and in that he attacked the whole title claimed by the Crown, including the coroner's verdict and the office found. That writ of right penetrated back to the true title of the property, and, marching through all legal obstructions that might obviate justice in the premises, that title at last was found to rest in the party who brought his petition of right, if he proved that the condition was performed, and when that was established he was reinstated—put back again in his estate—and damages were paid him if any had been sustained in consequence of his ouster from the possession of the property.

Now, sir, let me ask what remedy any citizen of the United States has got against the Government of the United States under like circumstances? None of your citizens can sue the Government, and yet any citizen can sue the Crown in England. You dole out through your statutes permission to your people to sue in certain cases in the Court of Claims, and that is all that you do. When you forfeit this land grant under this bill you give to this railroad company or the bondholders, or whoever else may be interested in it, no remedy against the Government of the United States. If any man should bring a bill in equity or an ejectment or any action at law against the Government of the United States after we put it in possession of these lands, that action would be immediately dismissed on the ground that Congress had never permitted such an action to be brought. There, then, stands the citizen in this unequal attitude toward the Government, his property gone by an act of Congress, and no remedy given to him at all against the Government. What must he do? He must wait until the Government sells that property to somebody else, and then he must bring his action in some local court in some Territory or in some State to test the validity of that title. There he raises the question in a collateral way; there the majesty of the law of this land becomes more powerful in the end than the act of Congress, and the poor fellow who has been ousted of his possession can stand and question your act down to the very bottom.

But, Mr. President, this remedy is difficult, it is expensive, it is inefficient. It is not what the Government of the United States ought to give in the form of a remedy in a case of this kind. Suppose, sir, that your courts during the late civil war had proceeded with confiscations without giving notice at all, and suppose that your officers of the Treasury or your officers of the Army had seized the property of the people of the South and had sold it without the decree of a court, and then those people had afterward come into the courts of the United States or into the courts of the States and sued the purchasers for the property, we should have had almost as many lawsuits as there have been grains of wheat upon the Western plains during the last fruitful season. But you provided in that law that after the seizure and after notice these people whose property had been taken might come into court and require the Government of the United States to establish its title.

How is it in regard to this land that to-day belongs to the railroad company and that we intend to take, reclaiming the ownership to ourselves upon the pretext, or upon the fact if you please, of a breach of the condition-subsequent? The railroad corporation can not sue for it. That right is gone. It has no chance to sue for it; but if the Government of the United States sells to some person else the railroad corporation can sue that person. How many lawsuits would this give rise to? A myriad. What would be the uniformity of decision in these cases? There would be no uniformity of decision. In Oregon the questionwould be settled in one way perhaps in one court, and in another way in another court. As we apply the principle to this Oregon railroad so we must apply it in justice to all of them. Some of these suits will be brought in the Territories by private persons, and ten years after to-day, after these titles have been involved in labyrinths of difficulties, the courts, and at last perhaps the Supreme Court of the United States, will make some decision upon some of them that will produce more panic among the settlers and among the railroad men than the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman did. How did that great case come up here? How did it ever get here? It was a suit, as I remember the facts of it, about some tanbark taken from a tract of land that had been conveyed by the Government of the United States to a railroad. Here were a railroad company and an intruder that got into a lawsuit about some tanbark taken from the trees upon a tract of land, if I remember the facts correctly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Sawlogs.

Mr. MORGAN. Sawlogs, was it? And here, years after that grant had been called in question, not in Congress, but elsewhere, years after rights had sprung up under it, this sawlog case brought the great question into the Supreme Court of the United States, and there it was decided. What had occurred in the mean time? How many men had been induced by the appearance of affairs to invest their money upon this uncertain sort of title? There have been tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of investments made in respect of these lands in different parts of the United States.

I maintain, sir, that when we take this course—forfeiting this land, whether we do it for the violation of law by the railroad or whether we do it for a breach of the contract; it makes no difference what the ground is that we proceed upon—it is our duty to furnish to these people a remedy in the United States courts which shall enable them and us in one suit to settle all these difficulties. What does this bill provide? That these lands shall revert to the United States just as if the granting act had never been passed. Mr. President, the Government of the United States can not falsify its record. That act was passed. Rights have sprung up under it. Those rights are valid as far as the judges see proper to sustain them, and if we declare now that these lands revert to the United States Government, just as if that act had never been passed, we declare that which falsifies the record and shames the Congress of the United States. We have the right to repeal that act, I presume, if we desire to do so, though in its repeal we can not change vested rights that have arisen under it; but instead of repealing the act——

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. In a minute. But instead of repealing the act we merely let it stay on the statute-book untouched by our repealing power, and we declare the effect of it shall be hereafter as if it had never existed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Now if the Senator from Alabama will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know what it is about first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know what the honorable Senator desires me to yield for.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will explain to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. Make your speech afterwards.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not propose to make a speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Only a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I am so anxious to hear the Senator from Nebraska that I want him to occupy the floor in his own time and in his own way, not in my time and by interjecting his speech into mine. I shall listen with the greatest possible attention and pleasure I have no doubt to his debate of this question. He is well informed about it and is otherwise very able to handle it.

I was going on to say when the Senator interrupted me by some fresh idea that had got into his mind, one that was not in mine at all at the time, that we undertake to get rid of the effect of this act not by repealing it, but by declaring that it never had any effect, and should now be read as if it had never had any effect since the date of its birth. Ah, Mr. President, that is not a worthy way to deal with our own acts. Are we ashamed of it? Are we afraid of it? Do we want to expunge it? Do we want the judges to read it now as if it had never existed, or do we want to prevent the judges from reading it when it is offered to them upon the bench for their consideration? Shall they reply to the petitioner who brings his suit to recover some of this land "This act, though once an act, is no longer an act, and never was an act?" That is the situation we are put in if Congress, having once passed it and having never repealed it, has at last declared that it shall be considered by the courts as if it had never existed.

Is there any necessity to resort to such extraordinary terms in a statute as those in order to maintain the power of the Government of the United States to seize these lands? Is there any necessity for such harsh action as that? These lands when they are relegated to the domain of the United States are lands that have passed through the experiences and historic connections of this act. Everything that attaches to them that in any respect affects the title to them is something that belongs to these lands in consequence of legislation of Congress. If an equitable title has sprung up in favor of a third person, or if a legal title by estoppel has sprung up in favor of a third person, if the laches of the Government may be construed into an abandonment, as has been done often against governments as to their right of forfeiture, let all of these incidents that we have put upon these lands both by our legislation and by our inaction remain attached to this property, so that when the subject comes into litigation in the courts, whether of the United States or of the States, it shall be said that the Congress of the United States left these lands exactly in the situation in which it found them on the day marked by the passage of this bill.

I object, Mr. President, to any of this retroactive legislation, this rubbing out, this falsifying of records, this attempt to establish by legislative action matters as matters of fact that never existed; this attempt to bury facts that have existed and do exist. I object to it. This bill ought not to be passed with those words in it. This bill ought not to be passed until the Senate of the United States has attempted to furnish to the people concerned in this land grant a reasonable remedy, so that they may advance whatever their rights are in the courts of justice and have them adjudicated at a reasonable expense. It is for this purpose that I have interposed my objection to the passage of the bill in its present form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desired to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama before he resumed his seat. He has commented on the decision reported in 21 Wallace of Schulenberg vs. Harriman. I say it favors the very position taken by the committee and taken by this bill, and in the moment I have before the special order comes up I may be allowed to read from the decision that to which I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama:

> In what manner the reserved right of the grantor for breach of the condition must be asserted so as to restore the estate depends upon the character of the grant. If it be a private grant, that right must be asserted by entry or its equivalent. If the grant be a public one, it must be asserted by judicial proceedings authorized by law, the equivalent of an inquest of office at common law, finding the fact of forfeiture and adjudging the restoration of the estate on that ground, or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the property for breach of the condition, such as an act directing the possession and appropriation of the property, or that it be offered for sale or settlement.

That is precisely what this bill does, and that is precisely the thing which the Supreme Court in this case in 21 Wallace says may be done:

> At common law the sovereign could not make an entry in person, and, therefore, an office found was necessary to determine the estate, but, as said by this court in a late case, "the mode of asserting or of resuming the forfeited grant is subject to the legislative authority of the Government. It may be after judicial investigation, or by taking possession directly under the authority of the Government without these preliminary proceedings."

Here is the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, which the railroad companies and their attorneys and friends everywhere roll as a sweet morsel under their tongue, and that very decision, to which the Senator refers, expressly gives the authority to Congress to do what it is now proposed to do. I have a few other authorities which I may take the liberty of troubling the Senate with hereafter, because I know the Senator from Alabama adheres to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Where does the Senator desire his amendment to come in?

Mr. MORGAN. As additional sections.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

> SEC. —. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any law of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.
>
> SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the district of Oregon, under the direction of the Department of Justice, to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity, in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved May 4, 1870, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.
>
> SEC. —. That any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands, or any part thereof, which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath; and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in said cause, the court shall direct that such further proceeding be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.
> SEC. —. That the court, if it shall see fit, may tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the costs of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases; and the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined; but no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. SLATER. I move that the pending order be postponed until to-morrow, in order that I may move to proceed with the bill which has been under consideration this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the pending bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that the Senator from Oregon will not insist upon that motion. This bill has been before the Senate for some time, and we are getting to that point in it where we hope to get through with it before a very long time at any rate.

Mr. SLATER. I am anxious to dispose of the commerce bill at an early day; but looking at the state of legislation before the Senate and elsewhere, I think there can be no loss of time and that we shall probably reach a vote on that bill as early by delaying it to-day as by continuing its discussion. The bill just under consideration is a very important bill; this is the third time it has been before the Senate, and I have made this motion with a view of facilitating the interstate-commerce bill. I think I ought now to press the motion and ask the Senate to postpone the commerce bill until to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that this bill be postponed until to-morrow. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. SLATER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when Mr. FRYE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. FRYE] is necessarily absent, having been called away to the State of Maine.

Mr. HAWLEY (when Mr. PLATT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is detained in Connecticut by important business.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Beck,	Gorman,	Kenna,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Dolph,	Harris,	Plumb,	Vest,
George,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Walker.
Gibson,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—22.

Blair,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Pike,
Bowen,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sheffield,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Morgan,
Dawes,	Lapham,	Morrill,

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Allison,	Fair,	Lamar,	Riddleberger,
Bayard,	Farley,	Logan,	Sabin,
Brown,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Call,	Hill,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Hoar,	Pendleton.	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I ask consent to offer an amendment to the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, in order that it may be printed and be on the desks of Senators to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The amendment will be received and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. SLATER. Now, I move——

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules the Chair lays before the Senate the next special order, being the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes. This bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SLATER. I presume a motion now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare the forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks under the rules, which are a little obscure in regard to special orders, all these bills, including the one that the Senator from Oregon wishes to reach, are special orders, although the bill he refers to is low down, being now the third in the list of special orders. A motion to change that order is in order under Rule IX. The Chair will therefore entertain the motion to proceed directly to the consideration of House bill 181.

Mr. SLATER. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Is it now in order for me to ask the Senate to consider a report from a committee of conference on one of these railroad bills?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks under the rules that reports of committees of conference are always in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not desire, Mr. President, to interfere at all with the passage of the bill the Senators from Oregon are so anxiously urging before the Senate, but there are certain important questions connected with the bill which are also up on the report I had the honor to submit to the Senate at a previous day of the session. I had hoped that the members of the Committee on Public Lands would be willing to allow these questions to come up in such way as that we could have definite action on the part of the Senate in response to the refusal of the House to adopt the amendment that the Senate put upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill.

Mr. SLATER. I must——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not hear the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SLATER. I ask permission to appeal to the Senator from Alabama for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLATER. I certainly hope the Senator will not consume the time on this bill by motions which can only serve to complicate this measure and probably carry it beyond to-day. His report is a privileged report which he can make at any time, and it will only continue the antagonism, perhaps. I hope he will take some other time to make his report.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I had just disclaimed any intention to antagonize the Senator's bill in the sense he now mentions, and I appeal to him, as a member of the Public Lands Committee, and to every other Senator here, that when the House and the Senate are in controversy upon this same question that we are debating now, it is my duty to bring this controversy before the Senate and have its action, so that our future action upon this whole proposition can be governed according to the vote of the Senate. In what attitude should we stand here to-day if we should pass the bill which is advocated by the Senators from Oregon without the amendment I seek to put upon it now? We should have a pending report before this body of one of its conference committees not acted upon, which brought up the very same question as a controvery between the House and Senate, and we should decide that question by the views we should take here to-day in a collateral way. The Senator from Oregon ought to be entirely willing to have the question of the propriety of this amendment passed upon by the Senate on the report I have made. If the Senate votes me down, or votes the committee down upon this question; if the Senator wants to move that we shall recede from the amendment we put upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill heretofore, and he should sustain that motion, then, of course, I could have no pretext in the world for offering further opposition to the passage of his bill.

I assure the Senator that I have not the slightest disposition to consume time or to interfere in any way with the passage of his bill, but I have not only a disposition but a duty resting on me as a member of the conference committee to see that the Senate of the United States is put fairly in possession of this question and has an opportunity to act upon it.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order. Has the report of the conference committee been submitted to the Senate, so that it is before it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not yet informed what report the Senator from Alabama desires to make.

Mr. COCKRELL. I raise the question of order that nothing is in order until that report is presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama, the Chair thinks, is entitled to speak on his amendment. The Senator from Missouri knows that the relevancy of debate is not a question here that the Chair can determine; and the Senator is speaking technically on a pending question—his amendment to the bill of which the Senator from Oregon has charge, now before the Senate. He has given notice in the course of his speech that he intends to submit a report of a committee of conference. The Chair thinks he is entitled to go on upon the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably; but I wanted to get at the real question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Senator from Alabama concludes his remarks and submits the report, the Chair will determine whether that report is in order or not.

Mr. MORGAN. The report has been made to the Senate, but the question has not been acted on. The Senate has taken no action upon it except to receive the report of the disagreement of the committee. I have not yet moved that the Senate further insist on its amendments.

Mr. SLATER. Then I raise the question of order whether it can be introduced now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Senator from Alabama makes a motion, the Chair will rule whether it is in order or not. The Senator from Alabama has as yet made no motion, but is entitled to the floor on the pending question, being the amendment he has offered to the pending bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I make that motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it is not in order except as a motion under Rule IX to proceed to the consideration of a different bill. That motion is in order and must be decided without debate. But as a privileged report the Chair thinks the privilege has been lost. The committee reported on a previous day that the committee had been unable to agree with the House conferees. That left the bill before the Senate for consideration on the Calendar, and it is in order, the Chair thinks, under Rule IX, to move to proceed to its consideration, just as the Senator might move to proceed to the consideration of any other bill, but not as a privileged report.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, Mr. President, having made the report and not having made any motion upon it at all, and the privilege, according to the opinion of the Chair, having been lost, I, of course, as the chairman of that committee of conference, am exonerated from bringing it again to the attention of the Senate. I supposed, however, that whenever the question was before the Senate it was at any time a question of privilege as to whether that report should be taken up for consideration. It has not been considered. It has merely been received.

However, I will restate the attitude of this case before the Senate in the hope that Senators may feel enough interest in it to take an intelligent view of one of the greatest questions that has ever been brought before this body; and that is, whether the United States Government will furnish any remedy at all to persons interested in railroad land grants for controverting what action we may take here, or for controverting the fact whether or not those lands were liable to forfeiture. It is said that there are about 200,000,000 of acres of land now subject to forfeiture, and I believe the attacks that are made by different bills upon land grants heretofore made involve now considerably over 100,000,000 acres of land.

The interests that are owned by different people in the United States and in foreign countries in these lands are diverse; they are scattered over all civilized countries, and of course they are very important. They are in the hands of all kinds of people, people belonging to foreign governments and the home government, people who are able to take care of their own interests and people who are not. There are thousands doubtless of administrators, trustees, widows, and orphans who are interested in the bonds, and in other questions which arise out of these grants. I have not found one man in all the course of the investigations which have been made before the Committee on Public Lands who would come into that committee or send any intimation to that committee that he was satisfied to have his rights disposed of by an act of Congress without any hearing on his part. I never found one; so that all the adversary claimants, whoever they may be, and wherever they may be, under this enormous system of railroad land grants which was inaugurated thirty or forty years ago have an interest in this question. That question is whether the Government of the United States will forfeit these grants by a simple act declaring their forfeiture and relegating them to the public domain, or whether it shall be accompanied with some provision of law by which these rights may be asserted. When I have discharged my personal duty in regard to this matter by bringing forward their claims and submitting them to the Senate of the United States, I shall of course be excused in conscience and otherwise from any further responsibility in the matter.

This subject was presented to the Senate during the last session. It was debated as freely as any other question could have been debated at that time, perhaps four or five days before the close of the session. Several Senators engaged in the debate, and the question was as well understood by the Senate, I think, as any other that has been before this body. The Senate by a vote of singular unanimity, I believe 30 to 10 or 11, voted to put the amendment upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill precisely in the words of the amendment I now offer to this bill, and that amendment went to the House of Representatives, and without any debate at all it was not concurred in. The bill which came here from the House had never been debated there. The bill forfeiting the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad land grant, important as that grant was, was not debated; and I supposed that when the committee of conference got together there would be some debate, and there was, and a very instructive debate it was, but, so far as I am aware, without changing the opinion of the members of the conference on either side.

So the Senate has taken its attitude upon this question. It has taken it after discussion, after full debate; it has taken it upon a yea-and-nay vote of 10 or 11 to 30; and now the attitude then taken by the Senate is brought in question by the amendment I have had the honor to offer. If the Senate on a call of the yeas and nays on this bill should determine that this amendment ought to be abandoned, the committee of conference will when raised again doubtless consider itself instructed so to abandon the amendment, and we shall leave ourselves in the attitude which is demanded by some who are desirous of forfeiting these land grants of having done so without furnishing any remedy or redress whatever to persons who make honest and bona fide claims.

These claims are just as numerous as the roads; they are more numerous, for they are varied and multiplied with every distinct grant. It would not be fitting or becoming in me here to-day, although the questions are so very important, to go through these different land grants and point out the different wrongs and evils which would follow the legislation that is proposed in this bill, striking out the amendment that has been voted by the Senate on the Atlantic and Pacific bill and is offered also to this bill. But, sir, in every particular case of the forfeiture of a land grant a new and a very important question arises. I will give the Senate one or two examples of the questions that arise under these laws to enable it to determine whether or not we are willing to take the risk and responsibility upon ourselves of deciding all these grave matters by a legislative decree of Congress without a hearing of the parties to these controversies.

I will take now the Texas Pacific Railroad land grant, one that has not yet been considered by the Senate. That was a grant to the Texas Pacific Railway Company from the borders of Texas on through the public domain as far as San Francisco in California—an immense grant of land. A California corporation—the Southern Pacific Railway Company—commenced with its own funds and resources to build a railway from San Francisco in the direction of El Paso in Texas, or upon the border line between Texas and Mexico. As it came on with its immense power, its immense resources, building its road with extraordinary rapidity, it made proclamation to the world, and especially to Congress, that it did not ask or demand any subsidy, and it stood here in the attitude of an antagonist and opponent of the Texas Pacific Railway, which then, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas Scott, was claiming land grants and bounties or subsidies for the purpose of its construction.

But the Southern Pacific Railway, under the direction of Mr. Huntington, its president, I believe, or at least its chief manager, came on in the direction of El Paso, acting under the California charter and under charters from the governments of Arizona and New Mexico, and finally succeeded in completing the road to El Paso on the border between Mexico and the United States. After that had taken place, after that road had been built, the Texas Pacific Railway transferred its entire land grant to the Southern Pacific Railway, transferred it bodily, putting the Southern Pacific in the same position of ownership of the grant, so far as it could, as the Texas Pacific had under the act of Congress. Thereupon Mr. Huntington claimed that he had completed the road, that he had complied substantially with the condition of this land grant that the road should be completed within a certain time, and that having complied substantially with the purposes of the grant, and having obtained the grant by assignment from the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, his company became the rightful owner of the entire land grant.

The Committee on Public Lands of this body, following also the action of the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, have concluded that the transfer or assignment of this land grant by the Texas Pacific Railroad Company to the Southern Pacific Railway Company was without the authority of law, was in contravention of the statute, and was against public policy. In that land grant that great question arose, a pure question of law upon admitted facts, we, deciding that question for ourselves and excluding the courts from all participation in it, basing our action entirely upon our own judgment, declare that that land grant was not assignable in the manner in which it was assigned and that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company got no title under its assignment.

Now, Mr. President, not only the Southern Pacific Railroad Company but all the people between El Paso and San Francisco are interested in that question. Every man who lives in that section of country has a more or less direct interest in it. Not only they, but the holders of the different bonds issued by that company which are held by them to be mortgages on all the lands thus acquired are interested in the question.

Here is the great law question presented: Can one corporation receiving a land grant of this kind transfer it bodily to another corporation without the consent of Congress? We decide it, admitting no appeal to the courts, and as in some cases that have occurred here, we decide it entirely without debate. Is it not better, safer, wiser, and more just that we should have this law question decided by the courts in a direct proceeding?

Now I will take up another example. I will take the Atlantic and Pacific road. They claim a land grant reaching through the State of Missouri, the Indian Territory, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California, out to the seacoast of the Pacific Ocean. That land grant passes through a body of lands called the Indian Territory. That company, in order to perfect its grant and build its road, by agreement with the Cherokee Indians and the Creek Indians, extinguished their titles to the lands which constituted the bed of the road, the right of way, got a concession from them. They had also the authority of this act of charter for passing through the other Indian lands held in reservation by an executive order for the benefit of the Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians within the Indian Territory. They made some arrangement, I do not know now precisely what, for passing across that part of Texas which is called the Pan Handle. Then they had a land grant and a right of way from the border of Texas on through to the Pacific Ocean, intended primarily to reach the Pacific Ocean at San Diego. Intermediate between the Texas line and the California line some bodies of wild savage Indians were taken by the United States Government after this grant was made, and they were located upon the very tract that the company was to build its road upon. This company, after having failed to build its road, after having failed to build more than about forty miles of its road within the period limited by law for its construction, made a mortgage under a special act of Congress to trustees to raise money to go on and complete the road, a mortgage upon its franchise, upon its road-bed, upon its property of every kind, including its land grant. This act of Congress was made expressly so broad as to enable the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to make the mortgage in order to raise money to complete its road.

It is worthy of notice, in this connection, that the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company were organized about the same time, and under contemporaneous acts of Congress, upon the idea that those roads could be built by the companies out of the endowment of public lands which the Government made to them; in other words, that they would be able to sell enough of the public lands to complete the construction of their roads. The Government of the United States, as well as the companies, found that that expectation was vain; that it could not be realized; that the roads could not be built without drawing in the assistance of outside capital. Thereupon the Government by acts of Congress changed its policy toward the roads and authorized them to mortgage their property and land grants, to issue bonds upon the mortgages, and to go into the markets of the world and raise money for the purpose of their construction. The Government, thereby becoming distinctly a party to this change of policy, omitted to name any period for a law-day in the mortgage, a most remarkable instance, as any lawyer is bound to admit. There was no period fixed in the mortgage for the maturity of the bonds, and if the railway companies had made the bonds to run for a hundred years they had the absolute right under the acts of Congress to do it.

Under such circumstances the companies went into the money markets of the country, they employed their syndicates in different parts of the world to place the bonds, and, as in the case in all matters of placing bonds, they found their way by drifting out through the communities into the hands of the owners of small sums of money. These small sums aggregrated furnished the capital which built the roads.

The Atlantic and Pacific Company, in virtue of the power given to it to make its mortgage and of the transactions which I have described, received money and credit enough to go on and build nine hundred miles of that additional railroad, commencing at Albuquerque, within the period of three years. A most wonderful achievement it was! They completed a connection between an existing system of railways connecting with Saint Louis and Chicago out as far as San Francisco. They built to the point called the Needles, and there Mr. Huntington met them with one of the branches of the Southern Pacific Railway. They furnished to that country—a most interesting and valuable country it is—commercial facilities the like of which no one could have dreamed could possibly have fallen to the advantage of those people inside of a century.

Here is the bill for the forfeiture of the grant to the Atlantic and Pacific which passed the House. The bill is almost exactly like the bill of the Senator from Oregon—a bill of open confiscation without remedy; a bill of seizure and confiscation without adjudication; a bill that compels this railroad company and all of its incidental creditors to accept the decree of the Congress of the United States as something that can not be directly assailed through a United States court. That is the situation. The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company in reply to our demand of forfeiture (and I voted for the bill to forfeit) says: "You had an express guarantee in this charter that you would open the right of way through the Indian Territory for the road, and you not only have not done it but we have sent our parties of engineers there to survey the route, and you have compelled us to retire from the Territory time and again. We have spent thousands and thousands of dollars in our efforts to survey our route through the Indian Territory." And the Government of the United States, which in the charter of the road pledged itself to remove all obstructions and to extinguish the Indian title as to the right of way, compelled the railroad company to retire from the Indian Territory, not even allowing them to survey the line. These are facts; nobody can dispute them.

Then, again, it was averred by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company that after they had commenced building their road beyond Albuquerque, when General Crook went down into the Mexican territory and got that savage band of Navajoes who had escaped from our jurisdiction and had gone there to make war upon us and brought them back, they were located right across the line of the railroad, and they were prohibited from interfering with the Indians or going along to build their road. They claim that under circumstances like these the Government of the United States had committed itself to the proposition that it would not insist upon a forfeiture of the lands, at least until after a reasonable time had elapsed after the difficulties that I mention had been removed. That is their claim. I can not deny its justice. I can only say that the railroad company are not building their road beyond The Needles, and are not, therefore, entitled to lands beyond The Needles.

Now, sir, how was that claim presented? It was presented, just like all the rest of the claims in favor of creditors of the railroad companies, by counsel before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate. Were they allowed to call witnesses to prove their claims? No, sir. The committee had no authority to make a judicial inquiry. I moved in this body in respect of one of these cases where personal fraud was alleged that the Committee on Public Lands should have authority to summon witnesses, and the Senate refused to give us the power and voted it down.

After you had shut the doors of the Senate committee against testimony, and the Senate committee have had nothing to rely upon at all except the records that have found their way into the Interior Department and the statements of counsel made before the committee, you require us to sit in judgment upon a title and to destroy it and give still no practical remedy to these people. I care not how flimsy or false their pretenses of title may be in my opinion or in the opinion of any one else upon the law or upon the facts; that, sir, is not a trial; that is not a hearing. Am I to come before the Senate of the United States as one of the committee charged with the investigation of this question and ask them to adopt my opinions upon the law and the facts of a case like this, and to adjudicate it finally and conclusively and never to allow the parties in actual interest to controvert these opinions unless they can go off and find some court where they can controvert them in a collateral way? I should feel that I had abused the confidence of the Senate and the trust imposed upon me if I had not sought out some remedy for the purpose of mitigating the harshness of the judgment that we are pronouncing in such a case.

I appeal again to the Senate, what have your Judiciary Committee recommended in cases of this kind? Bill after bill has gone before that committee and has been considered by them; they have made report after report to this body upon it, and they have uniformly refused to recommend to this body the adoption of any measure which did not include a remedy against their decision or a right to call it in question by a direct proceeding held in a Federal court of justice.

There was another case that I will cite as an example, a case upon which the House of Representatives acted and refused to declare a forfeiture. That was the celebrated case of the Backbone Railroad in Louisiana. In that case the majority of the House Committee on Public Lands reported in favor of the forfeiture, and the bill was taken up in the House of Representatives and practically without debate was acted upon in the negative; the House refused to follow the recommendations of the committee and declare the forfeiture. Now, what were the facts about that case? The Backbone Railroad Company had been chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana from New Orleans to Baton Rouge and to Vicksburg.

At Baton Rouge it was permitted to cross the Mississippi River going toward the northwest, and to extend its line to Shreveport by the way of Alexandria. That railroad company received in the very same act that made the grant to the Texas and Pacific Railroad a land grant in Louisiana. It never expended a dollar so far as we can find out. It did no work, it earned no land, and so faithless did it become, and so entirely useless, that the Legislature of Louisiana passed an act to repeal the charter. After that act had been passed and the charter had been repealed, a case was made in court, surreptitiously made, for the purpose of getting an adverse decision from the court to the effect that the Legislature had no constitutional power to repeal the charter. Another company, working in combination with Mr. Huntington for the purpose of extending his Pacific system on the west side of the Mississippi River into New Orleans, desired to build the railroad, and did build it on the west side of the river, on a route entirely different, from Baton Rouge down to New Orleans, from that which was occupied by the Backbone charter and also by the act making the land grant.

After the charter had been repealed, and after the company had been galvanized into a sort of semblance of life again for the purpose of making an assignment of its land grant, every member of the House and the Senate from Louisiana but one, I believe, was here inveighing against the charter, and asking the Congress of the United States to forfeit the land grant. Thereupon certain capitalists from the East came into the project, and they advanced some money for the purpose of assisting what is called the New Orleans Pacific road to build its way. They advanced some money, and thereupon they organized the old Backbone Railway Company, and they transferred the grant by assignment from the Backbone Railway Company to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company. They took the property of the United States granted to a particular company which had become defunct, had been killed by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana, and transferred it by assignment into the hands of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and these gentlemen who are so extremely anxious to forfeit land grants found sufficient reasons why they would not forfeit that.

Now, what is Congress going to do about that? The House defeated the bill and refused to forfeit the land grant. A bill was reported back to the Senate from its own committee with a declaration that the grant should be forfeited except as to those parts which may be considered as having been earned by the building of the road by the assignee company after the date of the assignment. Thus we make contradictory decisions on about the same state of facts, and yet we ask the world to admit that we are infallible as judges.

Here are questions of a grave character, and in great number and variety to be decided. Who is going to decide them? Who is going to prevent a court from coming in to adjudicate upon matters of this kind? Who is bold enough to do it? After the committees of the House and the Senate have passed upon measures of this kind, and after the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate have continually advised you that you have no right and no power to do it, who is bold enough to do it? It must be a keen appetite for confiscation that will not stop to consider anything relating to power, but will gulp and gobble down railway company after railway company in the hope of being able to have afterward a quiet conscience and a good digestion. It may be that they will, but I do not want the burden of it. The better plan and the honest plan, as I conceive, to deal with this question is to make your declaration (which is equivalent to a seizure under a confiscation law) that in the name of the sovereignty of the United States of America we intend to reclaim these lands, but if you have rights which the courts of the country will sustain against that declaration as being superior to the declaration, let the courts pass upon the rights and so decide. Then you have got justice without sale, delay, or denial.

Because I take this position I have been assailed in the newspapers of the country (humble as I am and as my opinions must be) as being the man who desires to prevent justice from having its full sway against these forfeited land grants to the railroad. Mr. President, there is something that is not disinterested in these representations. There is some disposition it seems to me to hoodwink justice. There is some disposition to seize hold of the popular clamor for the purpose of compelling men to do that which they know is wrong and which they would not do in regard to the humblest man in the world. It is in moments like this that I thank God that he gives me the moral courage still to do what I conceive to be right without fear, favor, or affection; and I can not conceive that I would be doing right as a Senator to pass in judgment upon the rights of property of any individual or any corporation without giving to that person a right to question the validity of the decree that I have passed. I am not a judge, nor is the Senate a court, nor have we judicial power, nor can we administer the ultimate rights between the Government and a citizen by acts of legislation. It was not intended, and when we do it we violate the spirit of the Constitution of this land.

I am, therefore, for adhering to the action taken by the Senate by this decisive vote that in making declarations of forfeiture we will grant to the courts of the United States the jurisdiction to hear and determine these questions. That we will save the people from the myriad of lawsuits which must arise under the forfeiture of these land grants if we do not provide some speedy and efficacious remedy by which the questions can be settled.

What is that remedy? As provided in the amendment which was put upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill, and which I offer now to this bill, it is that the district attorney of the United States for the particular district shall file a bill in the circuit court of the United States in the nature of a bill of interpleader. He shall be under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, in order to insure probity and also in order to insure speed of action in the matter. He files his bill there in the name of the United States Government against the forfeited corporation and all others concerned. He makes as parties defendant to that bill those persons whose interests are obvious upon the face of the record, and they proceed to make up the issues and to controvert the questions before the court in which they think that their rights are involved. If there be other persons who are interested as claimants under the law of the United States against the Government or against the railroad company, they can come in by petition after due notice, and they can have themselves made parties defendant to that suit. If a great number of them come in their petitions can be consolidated so as to save the expenses of the trial of the same question on each petition and to speed the progress of the cause. Thereupon the court proceeds to judgment upon all these different controversies. No petition can be filed later than a year after the bill of interpleader has been filed. That is a pretty short statute of limitations, and the object is to encourage men to industrious action in presenting their claims. The cause is decided by the judge. Any party in interest has a right to appeal from the decision and take it to the Supreme Court. Then it is made the duty of the Supreme Court to advance the cause on the docket and to decide it as a cause of urgency, the object being that the Government of the United States shall come into possession of its real title to the lands, whatever that may be, in sufficient time to give to every man a clear title to the land that belongs to him, without embarrassment and without conflict with his neighbor.

Sir, I present that as a contrast to the plan under which questions have arisen in the courts and have been decided like the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman upon the question of the title to logs cut off a piece of land. I put this system in contrast with that which has been suggested here and elsewhere, of permitting every man who has got an interest in a question of this kind to sue his neighbor in some court, and after winding around through the different difficulties and labyrinths of the law finally to get to the Supreme Court of the United States with his case. I put it in contrast with the system which involves a necessity of tedious, wasteful, and expensive litigation, with a system which delays the bestowal of the public lands, delays the completion of final and unquestionable titles until cross-interests of every description that can be thought of have sprung up in the country. I claim that the system which I have had the honor to introduce and which the Senate has put upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill is one, and the only one that I can think of at least, which furnishes an adequate and proper remedy to all persons concerned under the circumstances.

Now, what harm is there in it? I have asked that question here and I have asked it elsewhere. What harm is there in it? What injury or injustice can it do? The answer has been, "We are afraid to trust the judges of the United States," and that is all of it. That is the only answer which any sensible man can make, it seems to me. We are afraid to risk the judges of the United States. They and their officers, in other words, may be corrupted; and we can not afford to trust the public interests of the United States in the hands of its judiciary. If such a suggestion had ever arisen in my mind I should have felt a sense of patriotism that would have prevented me from urging it or suggesting it. But that is where it comes to at last. In order to beat the railroads we must have, it seems, the judgment of other tribunals than the Federal courts, if a judgment must be had; but above all and before all we must fence out with absolute bars, as far as we can make them absolute, all right of access to any court for the adjudication of these questions. We must lay down the stern decree of the two Houses of Congress, approved by the President, that these lands are forfeited, and tell the party who holds a thousand dollars of bonds—some orphan child or some widow woman perhaps it may be in this country or in Germany—to confront this decree of the Congress of the United States approved by the President and beat it if you can. How are they going to do it? They can not sue the United States. We forbid them to do it. They must sue some person who is in possession of the land or has an interest in it of some kind. They must sue in some outside court, some Territorial or State court. They can take an appeal, if cast in the action, to the supreme court of that State; and if there is money enough in the question to justify the appeal or to bring it to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States, after years and years of delay they may bring it there and have it decided. In the mean time they are wrecked; the expenses have overcome them.

Sir, we are not without fault in these matters. Whatever rights there may be in favor of the United States Government in regard to these lands, there are some equities existing in favor of the holders of the bonds and of the different claims against these estates. By our carelessness, our inattention, and, as it is construed by them, by a fraudulent connivance at the situation, we have induced them to go on from year to year to expend their money and to raise more by the sale of bonds, and now they say to us: "You forfeit these lands out and out, and you furnish us no remedy. On the contrary, you bar the path to a remedy. You do that which Senators on this floor declare is an absolute confiscation out and out and is rightfully made." And all this we do, Mr. President, with haste and without mercy.

Mr. President, I have always understood since I have had the honor of a place at the bar in this country that penal laws and laws of confiscation and laws of forfeiture were not encouraged; that the Congress of the United States and the State Legislatures and the judges of the United States and of the State courts uniformly held, and had uniformly been controlled by the idea, that the Government would not break the law in its spirit in order to take advantage of it in its text. But if these moneys have been expended honestly and faithfully and in view of the security furnished by the public lands (admit that the people who advanced the money were mistaken in the law), can we shut our eyes to the equity of the transaction and to the equitable claims that arise out of it against us? Are we not bound to consider that these men have been misled by the laches and the other indifferent conduct of the Government of the United States into making their investments? When they come to a court and present these questions, as they have presented them to your committee, that court ought to be allowed to decide them, and your committee ought not to be compelled to decide them, cutting off the courts from all opportunity to investigate them.

Mr. President, I do not wish to pursue this subject any further, but I hope that the Senate will put this amendment on the bill. It can not hurt it. If there are no creditors of this railroad corporation, no bondholders, and no persons whose rights are interfered with, the bill which will be filed in the circuit court of the United States at the suit of the United States of America will be decided inside of six months; it will be all decided, and then nobody can complain. But if there are creditors who may be injured and who have rights, and we do not give to those creditors the opportunity to be heard in the courts of the United States, we do them an injustice. This bill was reported back to this body on an assurance given in the committee by at least one of the Senators from Oregon that there were no creditors of this railway company.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. Since the previous discussion upon this bill I have called to the recollection of my colleague [Mr. SLATER] the circumstance that when he had written his report to accompany the bill he referred to the fact that these lands were mortgaged, and in the report claimed that the company had used the credit of the unearned grant for the purpose of constructing other portions of the road. I called his attention to the fact that while it was true that all the lands were mortgaged, the bonds were not issued except as the road had been completed, and the bonds had not been issued for the uncompleted portion of the road. I said in the former debate on this bill that I never had stated in the committee-room or elsewhere that these lands were not mortgaged. I could not have done so, because I either drafted or participated in the execution of the mortgages myself. It was only upon this question (I do not know that I should term it a question of veracity, but upon this question of fact) that I desired to speak at this time. The fact is that the fact was stated more than once in committee that the lands were mortgaged, and when my colleague reported upon the bill and prepared his report he referred in his report to the fact that the lands had been mortgaged.

Mr. MORGAN. Whatever may have been the recollection of either of the Senators from Oregon, I am quite sure that I addressed to one of them a question in the committee as to whether there were any creditors of the company, and I was answered that there were not. More than that, the honorable Senator who sits behind me [Mr. SLATER], on the morning that the bill first came up in the Senate during the present session, was interrogated by me, and stated that there were creditors of the company; that he had been recently informed of it; and when asked as to when he had ascertained the fact he said it was that morning he had first become acquainted with the fact. That was after the bill got into the Senate. The RECORD shows that statement was made. What I am complaining of—I do not complain of anything really——

Mr. SLATER. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SLATER. The Senator is correct as to the colloquy that occurred in the Senate. As to that I was mistaken, and my attention was called to it by my colleague. He referred to what took place in committee, and the conversation that came up between my colleague and myself as to the language and terms of the report, and the part of the report he objected to was stricken out. I was led into the mistake and misapprehension from the fact that it was stated before the committee that there were no bonds out for the uncompleted portion of the road, and I was under the impression at the moment that there were none at all.

Mr. MORGAN. But the fact is, as the Senators now give it out, that there are bondholders who hold bonds against the railroad company, and whether they were given out after a portion of the road was completed or not the bonds were held against the franchise and against all the lands. These bonds have not been paid; no one pretends that, and if we do not cut off the entire security by this bill we cut off part of it.

Mr. LAPHAM. If the Senator will allow me I will state that the bonds are mainly held abroad. They are mainly held in London.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not know that, and I am a member of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will permit me I will also state a fact which may be of importance to him just at this stage of the debate, a fact which has come to my knowledge from a person thoroughly acquainted with these lands and a reliable gentleman. The lands which it is attempted to forfeit are along a line about seventy miles in length. They are timber lands, covered with very heavy growth and are exceedingly valuable, and they are the very lands that by the amendment adopted by the Senate in reference to this bill have been cut down in value from $2.50 per acre to $1.25. If, as is now stated, those lands are held as security for the bonds which were issued, they are undoubtedly the most valuable portion of the security for the bonds.

Mr. MORGAN. This colloquy illustrates the point I am making, that it is an impossibility for a Senate committee or the Senate of the United States to try these questions intelligently and to come to a sound judicial decree about them under existing circumstances. We have not got the appliances; we have not got the means of rendering a proper decree. Here are Senators who announce that they did not know anything about this debt. Here is one of the Senators from Oregon who announces that he did not know anything about it when the bill came up. Here is another Senator who drew the mortgage. Here is another Senator who informs me now that the bonds are held abroad. Doubtless some of his constituents or some of his friends abroad have reminded him of their interests in this question. Here are bonds outstanding that are a lien by the express terms of the mortgage upon the whole land grant. Here is a Senator who announces upon information derived from a person whom he respects that the part of the land we are now confiscating is one of the most valuable parts of the security for the payment of the bonds. Here is the Senate of the United States about to decree an absolute forfeiture and confiscation of the lands, and here are the Senators from Oregon objecting that any court should have anything to do with it. They may have good grounds for that objection.

It is none of my business what their grounds may be, but there is danger ahead of us if we undertake to pass the bill without the amendment or something like it. There is a wrong to be done to somebody. How easy is it now, if we put this amendment upon the bill, to allow these people to go, yes, to cause the Government to go into its own courts and file a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader and have all these questions settled. Why shall we refuse to do that? What great public demand is it that compels us thus to throttle justice in its own temple and refuse to allow our own judges to decide upon questions of controversy involving large estates like this?

I am astonished, sir, at the pressure against this amendment. It occurs to me that the honorable Senators from Oregon ought to invite its adoption. They ought to say to all people who are concerned in this grant: "Come into the court and show what your claims are, and show whether they are valid in law or not. If they are valid our judges are honest enough to respect them; if they are invalid they will be soon rejected and we will know exactly the state of the title to this land."

It seems to me that we can not avoid the duty under the circumstances presented before the Senate at this moment of time of voting this amendment on the bill. Surely I should have offered it in the committee, I should have taken the judgment of that honorable body upon the amendment if I had had a thought that there was a creditor outstanding whose rights could be affected by this act of violent confiscation. I am not prepared to confiscate lands out of hand by a legislative act. I am not here to seize the property of the people of the United States who claim it, whether they are railroad corporations or private people, and upon my judgment, derived from a meager, unsubstantial, and unreliable statement of facts, to deprive them of their property and then afford them no remedy.

Sir, there ought to be a remedy equivalent to the petition of right in the United States. The people of the United States will never enjoy the liberties of their ancestors under the English Government until they have the free right of suing the Government exactly as they do in England in respect of any matter that relates to their titles to real estate derived from that government. There ought to be, but there is not, such a right. Our system of jurisprudence has been so arranged as that we deny remedies to citizens against the Government, except where we give them under special acts of Congress. Here is a broad field of litigation opened by an act of Congress, forced upon the people by an act of Congress, and then we refuse to grant to the people the right of access to the Federal courts for the decision of these questions speedily, and almost summarily, because some men say that they are afraid to trust the judges. What sort of a government have we got if the judicial department of it can not be trusted to pass upon the title of a railroad company to a land grant? When did Congress establish its reputation for immaculate purity and honorable action to that high extent that it should rise above the title of the judges to the same distinction?

When have we found the precincts of the courts haunted by gangs of foul lobbyists who attempt to pervert the judgments of the courts of this country? No, sir; it is not the courts that they visit; they visit Congress. They are here; they are not there. They are not found in the sanctuary of the Supreme Court, but oftentimes they are found in the lobbies of this body. I will not say that where the carcass is there will the eagles gather together, for that would be unjust; but I will say that for a serene, honest judgment, of perfect integrity, and one upon which the country can rest with satisfaction, commend me to a court rather than to any legislative body.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to follow the Senator from Alabama in his long argument in relation to his amendment offered to another bill, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill before it relates to a different grant, couched in different language, and surrounded by different circumstances. Whatever may have been right in regard to the amendment as attached to the bill to which the Senator refers, no such condition of facts exists or surrounds this grant.

The grant was made in 1870. The road was to be completed in 1876. Some forty-odd miles were completed within the time within which the grant had life. Since 1876 not a single lick has been struck in the construction of the remainder of the road. For eight years the condition has been notoriously broken. The company has not even intimated that they would continue or make an effort to continue the road. More than that, the late president of the company, Mr. Villard, in a letter to the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, signified that it was impossible for them to continue the effort, or something to that effect.

As to the question of the outstanding bonds it is not necessary for us to inquire into the facts in regard to that. We have only to refer to the terms of the statute upon which the grant rests. The language is explicit that the grantees are to build the road within the time specified; and the implication is, if implication can arise in the English language in any form in which it may be expressed, that if they did not complete the road within that time the lands were subject to be reverted to the Government of the United States as for a condition broken. That is precisely what we are asking here to-day. It is not confiscation; it is simply asking that which the terms of the original grant contain within it. It is the meaning, the purpose, the express intention so far as it could be expressed that if the road was not built within the time specified in the act Congress would reassert its title to the lands.

If the company having the grant went into the market with that title conditioned as it was and procured money, the persons advancing the money must look themselves to the security. It is not for us to look and see that they have their money when they put it upon security that has not been realized. They loaned their money upon a specified title; they loaned it to a corporation that had the right to build the road at the time of the loan, encumbered by the condition. The parties to whom they made the loan have not completed the work; they have not performed the conditions. They had notice in advance of this matter, and now it is not quite correct it seems to me that this plea should be made for them, when the company have come here in the way they have, with an eight years' lapse between any effort to complete the road—eight years of continuous broken condition.

The theory of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is very beautiful to behold, but it is false, it is misleading. It goes upon the idea that these people will have no right, that they can not seek their remedy in the courts unless we give them a remedy in this form. That is entirely a mistake. It is utterly impossible for the Congress of the United States to take from any person a vested right. If there is any vested right existing under the previous act that would be affected by the passage of the pending bill they will be able to go into the courts at the proper time and in the proper form and assert their right. To go into court in the form that the Senator suggests by his amendment is simply to attach to this forfeiture a condition that is to stand in the courts an indefinite period of time. It unsettles everything and leaves everything at loose ends.

It is not proper, perhaps, that I should allude to the manner in which this thing is viewed outside of this Chamber, but I wish to say to the Senator and to the Senate in regard to the amendment to the bill that he refers to, now pending before the Senate on a conference report, that in my judgment the Senate ought to recede from its amendment, and if no other Senator moves that the Senate shall recede I shall take the liberty to make that motion myself. I think the Senate ought not to insist upon that amendment. I think we should be placing ourselves in a false position. I think the time has come when these forfeitures should take place and the forfeitures should be just as broad as the original grant; that is, where the condition has been broken the United States steps in and retakes to itself what is remaining to which title has not been acquired.

There is one other point. The bill as it came from the House proposed to sweep from this corporation the entire grant, that which is classified as earned as well as the unearned land, the land adjacent to the forty-odd miles of completed road as well as the seventy-odd miles of uncompleted road. The Senate Committee on Public Lands did not believe the position of the House to be tenable, because in the original act it is provided that as often as the company shall complete twenty or more miles of road and have it accepted as provided in the act the company shall be entitled to receive patents therefor. As a matter of course, a patent is only the evidence of title, but when the law says that on a certain state of facts existing a party shall be entitled to a patent it was deemed by the committee that although a patent had not issued, yet it was to be taken as if it had issued in point of fact, and that the title vested not only upon the issuance of the patent but upon the completion of the contract and the conditions and the acceptance of the road by the United States; in other words, that the grant for each section of twenty miles was the portion of a grant, and that the right of the company attached to the land adjacent to the completed road as fast as twenty-mile sections were completed and accepted by the United States, and that the Government of the United States could not go behind this acceptance, it being within the lifetime of the grant, and sweep from the corporation the lands that had been earned.

Hence the amendment of the Senate committee reaches only the unearned portion of the lands. There can be no litigation about that. The grant is a plain one. What right can the company exhibit in a court in regard to this matter? It is not possible that they can exhibit any. The end will be simply in affirmance of the act of Congress that the lands were forfeited. As to any other rights that may come up, they are all provided for either in the bill or in the laws of the United States that bear on this case. So there is no pretense, in my judgment, for any such amendment being attached to the bill, and I doubt whether it is proper upon any bill that is likely to come before the Senate. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not proprose to discuss this bill at any length. On the 3d of July last I made some remarks on the then pending bill to forfeit the land grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, in which I went over the question of the power of Congress to forfeit unearned grants to railroad companies and of the propriety of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to that bill.

It seems to me there is some confusion in the minds of some Senators as to the precise legal status of this grant. The grant was a grant in præsenti; it took effect from the date of the grant. It acquired precision by the location of a definite line of the road. It was a grant upon a condition-subsequent. The condition-subsequent was the construction of the road in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress. The time within which the road was to be constructed was limited. In such a case at common law if the condition is not performed within the time limited in the grant, but is performed afterward and before entry for non-performance, the performance of the condition is as good as if it had been performed within the time prescribed. In other words, the title becomes perfect, and advantage can not then be taken by the grantor of the non-performance of the condition within the time provided in the grant.

In this case a portion of the road of the company was constructed within the time limited in the grant. No portion of the road has been constructed since the expiration of that time. Therefore, the question as to whether the company earned land by the construction of portions of its road after that time, and before Congress had interfered and declared a forfeiture, is eliminated from this case. It is not proposed by the bill to forfeit any portion of the land which has been earned. The object of the bill is simply to declare a forfeiture of the unearned portion of the grant. That is undoubtedly within the power of Congress. All lands granted to the company have been included in a general mortgage or mortgages, and also in a deed of trust, but, as I understand it, bonds have not been issued for the portion of the road which has not been constructed. Under the terms of the mortgage, bonds could only be issued as certain sections of the road were constructed and accepted by the President of the United States; consequently, while the lands not earned are included in the mortgages, it can hardly be said that the bonds issued for the constructed portions of the road are a lien upon the unearned lands.

Besides, I suppose the title of every corporation and person claiming under the railroad company depends upon the same conditions that affect the title of the railroad company itself, and if Congress has the power to forfeit the lands as against the railroad company, it certainly has the power to forfeit them as against every corporation and person claiming under the company.

In the case of the grants of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company another question arises. In each of those acts, in addition to a provision for the forfeiture of the land granted in case the road is not constructed within the time prescribed, it is provided in substance that in case of a breach in the conditions of the grant Congress may do whatever is necessary to secure the completion of the road; and it is contended that such provision is the only penalty which Congress reserved to the Government the right to inflict for a breach of the conditions upon which the grant was made, and that Congress can not deprive either of those three companies of its land grant except for the purpose of using the lands for the completion of the road. That is a question which I thought ought to go to the courts—a question which would be involved in the title to all the lands declared by the act to be forfeited if they should be opened to settlement and sale under the laws of the United States for the disposal of the public lands.

Therefore I favored the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the bill to forfeit the grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, and with my present views upon the questions I shall feel bound to favor the amendment if offered to the bills to forfeit the grants of the Texas Pacific and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, not because such an amendment is necessary to secure to the railroad companies and their grantees their rights, for it is utterly impossible for Congress to cut off or destroy a right which has accrued to the granted lands. A railroad charter granted by Congress is a contract between the Government and the railroad company, and so far as the land grant is concerned it is not in the power of Congress to pass an act which would impair that contract. In any controversy which may arise between the mortgagees of the railroad lands or any grantee of any of such lands from the company, or any other person claiming any interest in the lands under the company and persons claiming under the laws of the United States for the disposal of the public lands, the question of title can be raised and litigated in spite of any act of Congress. In any action of ejectment brought by a pre-emptor or a homesteader against a party in possession claiming lands under the railroad company the question as to whether the lands in controversy had been in fact forfeited and restored to the public domain by act of Congress might be raised and judicially determined.

It was because I thought such a controversy might be prolonged for years in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad grant, and extensive litigation might arise out of the attempted forfeiture of the grant, that I deemed it wise as a matter of policy to provide for settling the title before the lands should be placed in the market, and for that purpose to provide for the bringing of a suit by the United States at an early day and for its early decision to determine the title of the land declared forfeited. I do not think that the persons interested in this grant claiming under the railroad company are numerous enough, that there are controversies enough likely to arise, or that there is a question of sufficient importance as to the power of Congress to forfeit the grant in this case to require such an amendment. As I said, the question that arises in the case of the Northern Pacific, and which arose in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific, is not involved in this case. The act of Congress making the grant in this case simply, by appropriate words, provides that if the railroad is not completed within the time prescribed in the grant the lands shall be forfeited, and the question of the power of Congress to declare a forfeiture in this case I submit is not an open one. Congress can not do anything more than declare the lands forfeited, which would be equivalent to an entry at common law for a breach of the condition. No party having any vested legal right to these lands from the railroad company will be injuriously affected by any act Congress may pass.

In connection with this matter I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to his amendment. I read from the bill to forfeit the land grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company which passed the Senate, which, I believe, is identical with the amendment offered to this bill. The third section of the amendment provides that it shall be the duty of the district attorney, under the direction of the Department of Justice, immediately to proceed in the circuit court of the United States by a bill in equity against any corporations or persons who claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress. The fourth section provides:

> That any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands, or any part thereof, which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath; and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim are necessary to do complete justice in said cause, the court shall direct that such further proceedings be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit.

I desire to call attention to the fact that while it is made the duty of the district attorney to file a bill against all parties claiming an interest in the land, and permission is given to any person not made a party defendant to come in by petition within a year, there is no provision that cuts off such claimants, as I understand the amendment, if they do not present their petition within a year. That is to say, if any corporation or person claiming an interest in any of these lands is not made a party defendant in such suit by the district attorney, and does not come in within the year and file a petition to be made a party, or if the court should decide that the case pending may go on and be determined in the absence of a party who applies by petition to be made a defendant, in that case the claim is not heard and is not determined, and there is no statute of limitations provided against such claimants. I think if we are to adopt an amendment of this kind it ought to be broad enough to secure a complete determination of all questions and claims which can possibly arise to any portion of the grant under the act of forfeiture. There ought to be a provision requiring notice of the pendency of the suit to be given by publication to all persons, known and unknown, having or claiming an interest in the lands, and further provision that if they do not appear within a year and file their application to be made defendants they shall be forever barred. If this is not done I fear the amendment will not accomplish what it is claimed to be intended to accomplish.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to explain the amendment a moment. I had both questions in my mind under consideration at the time I prepared this amendment to the former bill. The first relates to putting in an absolute bar, a statute of limitations, to those persons who do not apply within a year. I understand the effect of a decision of the chancellor, after notice is given for instance in a bill of interpleader or in a creditors' bill that persons interested may come in within a certain time and propound their claims, is to cut them off if they do not propound their claims, unless they have some excuse, such as insanity or idiocy or infancy, which would be an exception under the rules of the common law in the country from which we have derived our jurisprudence. So I found it difficult to prepare an amendment in the statutory form that would cover the whole case. We give them the right to come in within a year. They can not come in later than that. The case then goes to the Supreme Court of the United States if any person sees proper to appeal it. All the questions in the case are necessarily settled in that adjudication, and they affect persons who are in privity of interest, whether parties to the record or not. Therefore I did not essay in preparing the amendment to go on and anticipate all the different classes of cases that might arise, but merely left them to the general disposition of the law as is done in all bills of this kind, as I understand.

As to the other question about giving notice, that is provided for in the general laws regulating practice in equity in the courts of the United States. It will be the duty of the district attorney in filing his bill to give notice by publication under the rules of practice of the Supreme Court, in respect of all persons who may have an interest in the case, to come forward and propound their claims.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the act goes to the extent of requiring notice to be published as to parties who are not within the jurisdiction of the court but who are known. Now, there are provisions in some of the States that publication shall be made against parties known and unknown; and I think in a case of this kind, where there are liable to be so many parties having diversified interests, that sort of notice had better be given and should be provided for.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator correctly states the scope of the statute of the United States on this subject. At the same time the Supreme Court of the United States is a court of equity and has a right to establish rules of practice, and has done so. It has resorted to the English rules of practice as a general basis of the administration of the rights of parties in courts of equity. Now, take a creditors' bill and undertake to manage that. Under the rules of English chancery practice the court makes an order that all creditors who desire to prove their claims against the estate that is being administered shall have a certain time within which to come in, otherwise they shall be barred. Where did the court derive its authority to do that? Not from any statute of the United States, but from the rules of the English chancery practice, which have been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States under their authority to adopt rules for the government of courts of equity, so that the whole case is covered.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I have on a former occasion given expression to substantially all the views which I desire to impart to the Senate or which are of any consequence to the Senate on this general question; but I think with reference to this particular bill that there are some considerations in addition to those which have already been offered that might well be considered by the Senate.

I suppose with reference to all these proposed forfeitures of land grants to various roads that have been chartered with rights in the public lands of the United States as an encouragement to the construction of railroads through those lands, and none of which, with the exception of the Southern Pacific, in constructing its line from San Francisco to the Colorado River, has ever complied with the conditions of the grant, that the real question with Congress and with the American people should be, what it is right to do and not what have we the power to do in dealing with these corporations, their grantees, and those who have derived rights of various kinds during the operations of these grants. I have not, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, given so very much attention to the sharp technical legal questions that may arise on these grants and on the facts that exist in the various cases. Indeed I may say, and I think no one will contradict me when I say, that so far as regards an ascertainment of the facts in any case whatever that has been before Congress, there has been none. There has never been any such method of ascertaining the facts with reference to any one of these cases as would justify us in allowing a claim for pension. The Committee on Pensions has never to my knowledge passed a single case in favor of the defenders of this Union, the life of this Government, where they did not demand more rigid scrutiny as to the facts than has been made in any one of these cases involving the title to such tremendous masses of property.

It is idle to say that there has been any ascertainment of facts which is to be relied upon. There is none in this particular case. Neither Senator from Oregon nor any Senator on this floor can arise in his seat and say what amount of bonded indebtedness there is against this corporation to-day. It is still a question between the Senators, as I understand, whether there be one or two sets of bondholders or mortgagees. I doubt whether the Senator from Oregon on my left [Mr. SLATER] can answer whether there be two, or more or less. I know that the Senator on my right [Mr. DOLPH] says that he drafted these mortgages or was in some way connected with them. I am not quite sure whether he himself will say that there are two sets or only one, or whether there may be three; and who knows the amount of that bonded indebtedness or where it is located? It is admitted that there is a large bonded indebtedness, that it is owned abroad, that it is also owned in our own country in part, or that it may be owned in both; but nobody knows where it is, nobody knows its amount. The Senator [Mr. DOLPH] as he takes his seat says before the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama can be considered perfect it must provide for giving notice to all parties interested. It contemplates giving only one year's time for this settlement for these corporations, for these bondholders, no matter where they may be, to find their way to court, and it is a most egregiously severe provision in itself in that regard as it seems to me. But the Senator seems to understand that before these parties are to be deprived of their remedy—and it has been shown by the Senator from Alabama that they have no remedy practically when the question arises between the corporation and the United States—there should be notification given to them, they should have the opportunity to come in; and that idea is consonant with our most elementary notions of justice; but has there ever been such notice given in any of these cases?

You may say there have been pending these bills in both Houses of Congress, but that is not notice to the settlers on these lands. It is in no sense whatever legal notice. These parties have a right to presuppose that Congress will give them formal notice before it undertakes to find any question of fact whatever against them. Suppose in our States that we undertake the division of a township; suppose we undertake any other legislation which interferes with individual rights, such as the taking away of a water privilege, the erection of a dam for the purpose of increasing the manufacturing facilities of a given district, or to add property of that kind to the ownership of a corporation, we never legislate until we first give notice to all those whose interests may be concerned and they have the right and the opportunity to be heard. Yet no such notice has been given in any of these cases, and no American citizen has any reason to believe that Congress will undertake to steal his right without giving him notice. And yet, sir, I say—I say it because upon my conscience I believe it is the right, the honest thing to say—that this whole procedure in the direction of the forfeiture of these land grants where Congress has not undertaken first to ascertain the facts with some appearance of judicial fairness and some regard to judicial methods of procedure, although it may be finding those facts by its own committees—I say this whole process of taking these vested rights (for that it substantially is) is an organized robbery, and I am opposed to it.

I have opposed all these bills. I have opposed them in committee. I have voted against them because we had not first learned our facts, because we had not given those whose rights are concerned the opportunity to be heard; and I oppose this bill as much as any other of them on this general principle.

Now, let us look at this matter a little more closely. It is claimed here that whatever equities may exist, or whatever legal rights may exist, that ordinarily should be ascertained by means of a court, a tribunal provided by the General Government to the citizen, so that he could be heard in the nature of granting him the privilege of a writ of right, ought not in this particular case to be insisted on, because no questions arise save those which arise between the Government, itself the grantor, and the corporation or the grantees or assignees of the corporation; and if the Government has a right strictly to insist on the forfeiture of the lands so far as the corporation is concerned, as a necessary consequence, as a logical conclusion, it has a right to proceed further and take these lands without notice, without any formalities whatever, as against the assignees of the corporation which was the original grantee.

Now, sir, let us examine that position for a moment. It is now conceded that there are bondholders, at least one set of bondholders; that a portion of the road has been constructed; that the portion of the road which was built has been constructed with funds that were obtained from the bondholders, and that the chief security of the bondholders was an assignment or mortgage upon the land grant, upon the entire land grant, not the land grant opposite the constructed portion of the road, but the entire grant from one end to the other of the proposed route. That is conceded. So then the road, whatever there is of it, the forty or fifty or sixty miles completed, was built upon the faith of the entire grant, and these bondholders have an assignment of it. So far as I can learn the facts—I do not know whether I am right or wrong in this regard, for there has been no opportunity to ascertain by taking testimony, but I have the sort of information which I believe in and which is as good as the information of anybody in the Senate on the subject—I say, sir, that as near as I can ascertain the facts, the more valuable portion of this land grant upon which the road was constructed, so far as it has been built, is that which it is now proposed to forfeit because it is not opposite or contiguous to the constructed portion of the road. While the portion of the road that has been constructed, if I mistake not, is the most expensive part of it, the security upon which the money was obtained to construct that portion of the road was obtained by the pledge of the land which is not opposite that part of the line that is completed.

Then, in equity, as everybody will see at once, these bondholders have some rights, whatever may be the case as between the Government and the corporation, that did not put in its own money, it seems, but raised the money in accordance with the ordinary custom of getting it out of somebody else, and if the loss fell anywhere putting it on these innocent parties, who on the faith of the grant furnished the money and built the road as far as it is built. However the case may be between the Government and the corporation itself, there can be nó sort of doubt that there is an exceedingly strong equity in favor of holding this entire land grant so far as it is necessary to fully indemnify the bondholders. Any honest man would say so. The Government of the United States must say so, and any man who thinks that when they understand this question the people of the United States will become a party to any wrong such as I believe is here proposed much mistakes the temper of the American people.

So much as to the real equity. Whether it amounts to a legal claim or not, it is nevertheless a pertinent consideration for us to consider, and it ought to control our action, because we are called upon to legislate or not, as we see fit, to enforce this right of forfeiture or not to enforce it, just as may be in accordance with the dictates of justice. We are not called upon to enforce a right of forfeiture simply because it exists. Even the common law in the days of its utmost severity allowed the enforcement of the forfeiture of a condition subsequent to be waived; it could be enforced by nobody whatever except the original grantor, the original creator of the condition. No third party could interfere with it. And these forfeitures are not favored in the law. There has been no period in English or American history when they have been favored by the law, and if there be a half equity, the court will not enforce a forfeiture. And is there not an equity in this case upon this statement of facts which I make to you, which is the nearest to the truth I am able to ascertain—and I admit I have ascertained most of it since this bill reached the Senate, since the action of the committee, because I had supposed, like the Senator from Alabama, that he was correct in understanding that nobody was interested save the original corporation, and that its abandonment of the idea of completing the road was utter, absolute, and universally conceded.

Thus much for the matter of equity that ought to control us to the extent, as I think, of defeating this bill under the circumstances even with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama. Now, sir, as to whether here is any legal right of forfeiture as against these bondholders at the present time I wish to address a few considerations to the Senate.

We know that in every case where there has been a land grant, save one, the time provided in the original charter has elapsed before the completion of the road, and it is true that there never has been a forfeiture in any case declared even by Congress as yet. In every instance there has been what I consider and what I believe the courts will hold to be a license given to the original corporation or its assignees to proceed even after the expiration of that time to the completion of their road, and under that license the great completed portion of the Northern Pacific has been constructed and its land grant transferred to it, and the entire reach of its road from the middle of the country to the Pacific slope is now in process of construction on the faith of its grants. The same is true of the Atlantic and Pacific.

The point is that by the act of the Government, the deed of the Government in permitting the company to proceed after the right of forfeiture had accrued, raising more money, pledging or continuing the pledge of the land grant for the purpose of raising money in the markets of the world, there arises a license on the part of the Government to proceed for some length of time. Everybody admits that. If there is such a license or right granted by the Government to proceed for some length of time, how long is that time? It must have duration; it must be longer or shorter. It is not limited by any statute; it is not fixed in any definite way in the law. Now, what rule have we, what rule does the law itself apply in a case like this? Only this rule, and it is the rule of sound reason, that a reasonable or rational period of time shall be allowed. For what purpose? It is to complete the road, is it not? Very well. It can be nothing else, as it seems to me.

So, then, if the original corporation elects to proceed and does proceed in good faith, using such exertions, strenuous or otherwise, as under the circumstances a prudent man would use in the prosecution of his own business, the Government has said to that corporation, "So long as you continue in this course of action you shall have the right to complete your road and to possess and enjoy all the privileges that are contained in your original charter, and which you may have pledged in order to obtain the means for the completion of your road." If that is not so, then this at least is true: that if the corporation proceeding thus honestly, prudently in the prosecution of its purpose to complete its road, yet fails to succeed for the lack of means or for any reason whatever beyond its own control or within its own control to complete that road as soon as the public good requires, so that the original object for which the grant was made can be attained, then that corporation, as a matter of good faith and honesty on the part of the Government, is entitled to notice as to the time within which it must complete its road or the forfeiture will be insisted on. That much at least is the duty of the Government.

If this be so, if this is justice, if this is probably the law, if these are points which a court may well consider, I wish to call attention to one further proposition with reference to this particular case, and that is that these bondholders certainly are entitled to such notice if the original corporation itself were not. These bondholders, these mortgagees, placed themselves in an attitude of contractors with this corporation. The Government creates the corporation and gives it the power to contract. It necessarily then contemplated the fact that the relation of grantor and grantee, assignor and assignee, should come to exist between the corporation and these bondholders.

Thus, Mr. President, the Government has notice of the relative attitude of the several parties in the relations they came to have toward each other in this contract. The Government, in other words, knows that the actual control of the road is not in the hands of the mortgagees, that they are not able to compel the reasonably rapid construction of the road; and until such time as the Government sees fit to give the original grantee, the corporation itself, notice that it must finish its road, certainly it must be conceded that justice would require that the bondholders had a still stronger right to such notice in order that they might protect themselves. Now, how can they protect themselves? There is only one way in which they can do it; and that is by entering into possession, which they must obtain under the forms of law, and discharging the obligations of the original grantee, and thus protecting their title as against the Government. Is there any justice in saying that we shall proceed to the forfeiture of the rights of these assignees who have not been in possession, who had no reason to suppose it was expected of them that they would enforce their mortgages and perhaps can not as yet do so? Is there any right or justice that we now undertake to forfeit the major part of their security when we have never intimated to them until now that we propose to forfeit the right of the original grantee itself?

They, I claim, have right of notice of what we propose to do as to this grantee in order that they may protect themselves by enforcing their legal rights against the corporation and thus enter into possession and complete the road.

Now, Mr. President, here is certainly a very strong equity with reference to these bondholders that does not exist with reference to the original corporation itself. I believe that here is a legal right in these bondholders. I believe it is a right that could be enforced as between private parties, and that the opportunity ought to be given to them to set up that right as against the United States. I do not believe myself, as I have said before, that until all these interested parties have had fair notice of our intent to take from them this land unless they completed the road, in justice and equity we should legislate at all. We should give the notice first. If after having given the notice these parties unreasonably fail to take those steps which are essential to the completion of the road, then the Government can enforce its right, undoubtedly. But we have done nothing like that in any of these cases. We have not done it with reference to these bondholders; we have not done it with reference to any one of the original corporations whose rights it is proposed to assail in any of these bills.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I expected to occupy at the present on this subject. I think that whenever a land grant has been made, and the purpose to complete the road is abandoned and it is clearly abandoned, then it is not only the right but it is the duty of the Government to declare a forfeiture, to resume its possession, its control, and to dispose of the public lands to the people of the country as they may be called for. I am in favor of legislation of that kind; but the title of the poor man should be as well protected and as impregnable in the law as that of the wealthiest corporation. But, sir, when you assail the rich, or the corporation, you equally assail and you more assail and destroy that of the weaker individual, who is unable to protect himself by those means that a corporation may bring to its defense.

I look upon this effort disregarding the forms of law, the equities of the law, the methods that we pursue in the most ordinary controversies over property cases before justices of the peace, and every right that we have, whether it be of property or of person—I look upon the ignoring of all those just preliminary means of securing justice which are adopted in this legislation that is pending in Congress as a wild, agrarian movement veiled under hostility to corporations, but yet, really, the wildest and most dangerous movement as against property that has ever taken place in this country. I look upon it as likely to result only in very great ill and in the greatest ill to those who are the least able to bear it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, at the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Senate even I must beg to be allowed to say a few more words upon this bill.

The bill as it came from the House of Representatives is not at all the bill that is reported back by the committee and that we are now considering. All of the House bill is stricken out after the enacting clause and the Senate committee have reported entirely a new bill. The bill as it came from the House was a forfeiture out and out, as we call it, of all the lands granted to this railroad company notwithstanding the fact that the company had completed a very considerable portion of its line and to important places.

The Senate committee report back a bill as a substitute for that which forfeits only those lands which are "adjacent to the uncompleted portions of the said road." The attitude taken by the House in its bill was that when a cause of forfeiture exists in a grant like this it is a legal and technical cause of forfeiture, and reaches back to the original grant and unsettles everything that occurred from the time of the original grant down to the time of the enactment of the bill declaring the forfeiture. The position taken by the Senate is that notwithstanding that is true as an interpretation of the grant, yet the Senate has a right equitably to apportion the grant for them, so that while we might have the right to take the whole of it equitably, we should not be justified in that, and we will therefore only take that portion which is adjacent to the uncompleted portions of the railroad. So the Senate of the United States in this bill is to-day dealing with an equitable question. It has undertaken in a judicial way to sever this land grant into two parts, the one being its legal characteristics, the other its equitable characteristics or bearings. The first it rejects. The Senate rejects the right of the United States Government to claim a forfeiture of this grant in accordance with the terms of the act. Having abandoned that right, it assumes and asserts on the part of the Senate the right to apportion the grant and to say that we will give you so much and we will take so much.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. I attach some importance to what the Senator is saying if he assumes to speak for the committee. I wish to say, as one member of the committee, that I do not subscribe to the doctrine that Congress can declare a forfeiture which shall relate back and forfeit the entire grant. I think that each section of a road, under the peculiar provisions of these grants, is so far a separate grant that when the condition is performed as to that section the title is perfect and no act of forfeiture can affect it.

Mr. MORGAN. I was not speaking of the attitude of Senators in committee or elsewhere on this question. I was talking about the attitude of the House and the attitude of the Senate. I repeat, that the House treats this grant as one that is forfeited ab initio by the fact of non-compliance with the terms of the condition subsequent. The Senate says, "No; we will not enforce that view of the case at all. That is the legal view; that is what any court of law would order in a proper case; but instead of doing that we will cut the grant in twain, and we will confirm so much of it as is opposite to the completed portion of the road and will forfeit so much of it as is opposite to the uncompleted portion of the road."

Now I proceed to state again that the Senate of the United States in doing this assumes to itself the authority or the jurisdiction of a court of equity. That can not be denied. We depart from the law. We make not only a new law, but we make a new grant that is apportionable, when in fact, according to the terms of the grant, it is not apportionable. If this railroad company has actually earned one-half of this grant, and if that is the reason why the whole of it can not be forfeited, the whole grant remains and there has been no forfeiture. That is the logical, that is the legal, conclusion to which we are driven.

I voted for this bill in committee and I vote for it here, not because I believe that the Senate of the United States has the right to apportion a grant, but because I believe that the Government may waive a part of its remedy. That is all. But you do apportion the grant. Now when we are waiving a part of this remedy upon equitable considerations we waive it as against the bondholders, we waive it as against the corporation, we waive it as against everybody. Why then shall we set ourselves up as a court of law executing the absolute edict of the law so as to preclude these bondholders and these persons interested from asking a court for a further equitable consideration of their claims when we predicate our whole action upon the basis of equity?

That is a curious and a very ridiculous attitude for the Senate of the United States to be in. I regret it; but still it appears to be so. Having ourselves laid down that the true rule upon this grant is the rule of equity, a rule of fair apportionment, having admitted that this railroad company has earned a large portion of its grant, as it is termed, by building its road, we put our decree right upon that state of facts, and say, "Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther;" but when we come to a rule of equity we will shut the doors. If they desire to go into a court of equity to make a claim against this action of Congress, there is no court of the United States open to them; the United States can not be sued. We do not leave the title in abeyance; we do not leave it in the hands of private owners, we do not leave it in the hands of the corporation in any sense; but we relegate it back into the public domain, and it becomes the land of the United States, and the United States can not be sued. We shut the door, and after having pretended to act equitably in this case and upon the basis of the principles of equitable jurisprudence, we turn around and close out all opportunity on the part of persons who are interested from raising their questions of equity in respect to their mortgages.

When I say that these people claim that they have got equities under the mortgages, the honorable Senator from Oregon on my left [Mr. SLATER] replies to me, how can that be, how can they assert a claim of that sort when here is an act of Congress which contains certain conditions of forfeiture that everybody knows have not been complied with, and therefore they are shut out by the act itself? I respond to the honorable Senator from Oregon, you do not stand on the act; you abandon it yourself, and you establish a new rule of law in this case—one that never was heard of until this bill was enacted into a law. You abandon all previous rules and the grant itself; you establish a new rule which is based only on equitable considerations, and then you put your hand down and say they shall have so much equity and no more.

Mr. President, I protest that for a body skilled in law—and every gentleman on the floor of the Senate nearly is technically skilled in the law—to involve themselves in a matter of this kind when we are adjudicating, as the house of lords might do upon an appeal, a great question of law coming up before it, when we put ourselves in this attitude I think it is time we should consider what we are doing. We can not maintain ourselves on that position. No court will sustain us.

Then I ask again—and the question has not yet been answered—why should there not be a bill filed so that this whole matter may be construed judicially in the circuit court in Oregon? Why should it not be so? Who is going to suffer by the delay? Is it mere pride of opinion that we are controverting about here? God forbid. I have none of it in this case. Is there some great public necessity or demand to be supplied by this hasty action on our part? Must we have this grant forfeited instantly or not at all? Is it a question of peace and war? Why can we not await the adjudication of one of the courts of the United States upon a question like this? I protest again, sir; this bill would never have come into the Senate without at least a minority report accompanied by the amendment I have had the honor to offer if I had known that there was a creditor of this railroad company anywhere, for I would not sit in committee or elsewhere and allow such rights to be disposed of by a decree to which I am made a party against which no man is allowed to appeal. I can not do that.

Now, sir, I hope that the Senate in laying down this precedent which must have its bearing upon two or three hundred million acres of land will consider whether or not they intend to cut off men who claim against the Government under such circumstances from a proper remedy in the Federal courts. It is a great wrong to our people that they have no right to question the Government's action in its own courts. They can question the action of other people, but not of the Government. In this case when we are now undertaking to forfeit and recover lands because of forfeiture, this immense domain which runs through not only the territory of this railroad but a number of others in this country, let us be careful how we go, and let us feel that a sense of justice waits upon every step that we take in this important proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, there are business aspects of this case about which there is no dispute. It is conceded that by the act of Congress the title to these lands vested in the railroad company subject only to a condition subsequent. It is conceded that the company has executed a mortgage or mortgages upon its entire franchise and upon these lands, that bonds to a greater or less extent have been issued, bonds secured by the mortgages thus given, the mortgages having been executed to trustees. It is conceded that the company has built the most expensive portion of its road with the money thus raised upon bonds secured by mortgage on the entire property of the company.

It is eight years, it is said, since the company has done anything in the way of constructing its road. How do we know but what the trustees under the mortgage have foreclosed? Suppose they have foreclosed and purchased in the title to this property upon the foreclosure? If the Senator from Oregon is right the Government may nevertheless declare this forfeiture. Nothing could cut it off, according to his theory, because the mortgage is subject to the condition subsequent which was embraced in the original grant. Are we to decide those questions without giving the parties interested an opportunity to be heard? Suppose the Government had been authorized to enter its own courts and prosecute for a forfeiture of this grant and had commenced an action in the name of the United States, making this corporation only a party, not bringing in any of the bondholders as parties, and a judge of the United States should order final judgment without bringing in the parties really in interest and giving them an opportunity to be heard, what would be thought of such a judicial proceeding as that? Now, what are we doing? Who are we? We are the United States. We are a plaintiff declaring final judgment in our own favor without giving the parties interested any opportunity whatever to be heard. That is our position exactly. That is what this bill proposes to do. I trust it will not be done. I trust, as I said when this bill was up before the recess, that the Senate will not recede from the position it took, when by a vote of nearly three to one it added to a prior bill now in the hands of a conference committee the precise provision which is embraced in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Alabama. We owe it to ourselves to maintain that position. It is not a question as to the number of parties interested, whether they be few or whether they be many. If but one man has an interest as a bondholder we should stop and hesitate about declaring this grant forfeited without giving him an opportunity to be heard. It is not a question of numbers. It is not a question of the magnitude of the claim. Those considerations do not weigh a feather in my judgment in determining the point of giving to all parties interested, whether they are many or whether they are few, an opportunity to be heard as to their rights before the Government shall resume and put into the market these lands for the purpose of giving title to absolute and bona fide purchasers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who I see is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I shall therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAWLEY. The pair between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] has been changed to a pair with my absent colleague [Mr. PLATT], leaving Mr. CAMERON at liberty to vote.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. HARRIS. Did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that his colleague was paired with the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DAWES. I so understood him.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] arranged a pair with me during his absence upon all questions that we should probably differ upon, and not knowing how he would vote upon this question I withheld my vote because of the pair.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the announcement of the pair with the Senator from Florida.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Allison,	Conger,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Dawes,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sheffield,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Cameron of Wis.,	Lapham,	Pike,

NAYS—28.

Beck,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Sewell,
Camden,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Mandcrson,	Slater,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	Harrison,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cullom,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Dolph,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,	Walker.

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Kenna,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Garland,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Butler,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.,	Vance,
Call,	Hill,	Morrill,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Palmer,
Fair,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment heretofore made was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a second.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill just considered by the Senate was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask that the House joint resolution relating to an appropriation be laid before the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAIRS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a statement to the House. I supposed on yesterday we had Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, paired with Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, but by inadvertence Mr. RICE was left out. Mr. CALDWELL is paired with Mr. SPOONER. Mr. ROCKWELL, of Massachusetts, requested me to have him paired on yesterday; but I found it impossible to obtain a gentleman on the opposite side to pair with him.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. A bill introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE] granting a pension to the widow of the late Commander S. Dana Greene was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It ought to have gone to the Committee on Pensions. I ask that it be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7830), and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, January 13, be assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills or prior special orders; and in case this order shall be interfered with on that day, it shall be continued in force until one day thereafter has been occupied by said committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the bills to be brought before the House for consideration ought to be named.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say to my friend from Indiana that it was agreed in the Committee on the Judiciary that no measure to which there is any serious objection shall be considered under this order. There are a number of bills, some fifteen or twenty, that we think ought to be passed; these are bills looking to the administration of justice in the country, and to which there is no objection in the committee. I think no bill will come up under this order to which my friend from Indiana will object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that reports from the Committee on Public Lands shall be excepted.

Mr. REAGAN. Unless the resolution excepts the bill now pending relating to interstate commerce I must object.

Mr. TUCKER. The order excepts all prior orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless exception is made of reports from the Committee on the Public Lands I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for a moment.

Mr, STOCKSLAGER. If the regular order is demanded, I object to any exception being made.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state that I desire the House to pass the pension appropriation bill.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF GUN-FOUNDERY BOARD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was

JOHN BANNISTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request; which, by unanimous consent, was granted:

Mr. YAPLE asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of John Bannister, without leaving copies.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following request:

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the petition of the president and professors of the Ohio State University, asking for the passage of House bill 7498, to establish agricultural experiment stations; with the names of the faculty.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The petition is as follows:

OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY,
Columbus, December 5, 1884.

To Hon. J. D. Taylor:

The Congressional bill H. R. No. 7498, "to establish agricultural experiment stations," has been favorably reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and its passage recommended. It is now before Congress, and ready to be acted upon; and you are earnestly requested to give it that consideration which its importance entitles it to receive.

This bill proposes to provide such stimulus for agricultural improvement as the patent laws do for mechanics, manufacturers, and artists, and the copyright laws for authors. This seems to be the only way in which such an end can be reached. Farmers can not maintain a personal right to improvements in tillage, in crops, in stock-breeding, in overcoming the diseases of animals or plants, or in withstanding the attacks of insect enemies. However much of labor, or study, or money the farmer may expend for either of these, his neighbor can imitate his work and get as much profit from it as he himself can, and that without asking permission or expressing thanks. Some action of the sort proposed by this bill may fairly be asked, in order to put agriculture on a par with the other industrial arts.

Agricultural experiment stations carry on investigations in subjects of the greatest importance to agriculture, by the use of the accurate methods and processes of chemistry, botany, entomology, physiology, and kindred sciences. The analysis and management of manures, the production and adaptation of new varieties of seeds and crops, the destruction of injurious insects, the protection against contagious diseases of animals, have all been the subject of successful and satisfactory investigation in experiment stations. Wherever they have been established they have proved themselves of great benefit to farmers, and have received their unanimous and hearty support. There are a hundred or more of them in the various countries of Europe, and in our country they have been established in Connecticut, North Carolina, and New Jersey for several years, and are highly valued. More recently they have been established in New York, Ohio, Wisconsin, and some other States, and are doing good work.

When the interests involved are looked at, it will be seen that the outlay contemplated by this bill is exceedingly small, $15,000 a year for each State, or $570,000 for all the States, while 7,500,000 men, which is 44 per cent. of our working population, are engaged in agriculture; $10,000,000,000 are invested in farm lands, $400,000,000 in its implements and machinery; $1,500,000,000 in its live stock, and its annual products are $2,200,000,000. Surely the farming community may ask this comparatively small provision for their interests.

The bulletins publishing the results of the work of the State experiment stations are printed as soon as the work is done, and sent without charge to farmers who desire them. And they are producing a great revolution in farm economy wherever their influence extends. The benefits of intelligence and skill in farming make themselves felt wherever they are applied. To produce these, no other means equal to that of agricultural experiment stations have been devised. And no thrifty and progressive farming community can afford to do without them.

The establishment of these stations in connection with the agricultural colleges will be strengthening to both. The colleges have done excellent work, and have given a large return to the country for the gifts by which they were established. The $7,000,000 fund created by the gifts of the Government has been supplemented by $5,000,000 more from States and benevolent individuals. The colleges have been established in all the States, and more than 4,000 students are profiting from the instructions of above four hundred professors. These institutions mainly teach the branches of learning which relate to agriculture and the mechanic arts, while the experiment stations apply these branches of learning to the practical wants of the agriculturist. The studies begun by the students in college are carried on by the practical farmer in the field, and the college professors will be quickened in their duties by seeing the useful purposes to which their sciences are applied. It brings learning and work fairly in connection, and meets a pressing demand of the age.

The advantages to be secured by the passage of this bill are wide and far-reaching, both for the farmers and for the whole country; and the interests which it is intended to promote are so vital to the prosperity of the whole country as to be entitled to the fostering care of the General Government. Trusting that these suggestions will commend themselves to your favorable consideration, we ask for the bill your earnest support.

Yours, very respectfully,

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following requests; which, by unanimous consent, were granted:

Mr. BUCKNER asks leave to withdraw House bill 2339, entitled "A bill to prevent undue contraction of the paper circulation, and for other purposes."

Mr. POTTER asks leave to withdraw House bill 4975, to refund the bonded debt of the United States at 2½ per cent. interest, to reduce taxation upon circulating bank-note currency when secured by deposit of 2½ per cent. bonds, and to secure such currency against unnecessary disturbance and fluctuation by applying the national revenues economically to payment of the national debt.

Mr. DIBRELL asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers accompanying the bill for the relief of W. T. Green; no adverse report.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. ELLIS. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the joint resolution which I send to the desk and to ask consent for its consideration at this time in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] will be submitted to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available, to be applied to the support and maintenance of the Indians at the Crow, Fort Belknap, Fort Peck, and Blackfeet agencies in Montana Territory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana presents this privileged report and asks that it be now considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 308) was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, the estimate for this appropriation comes to us regularly from the Secretary of the Interior through the Secretary of the Treasury. It asks $50,000 for the Montana Indians at the four agencies mentioned in the joint resolution. This appropriation is most earnestly urged by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, backed by the agents at all these respective agencies, and also re-enforced by the indorsement of the Army officers and inspectors there. It appears that these Indians have not been adequately provided for this year; they were not adequately provided for last year, and hundreds of them absolutely starved to death. To meet this urgent condition of affairs I report the joint resolution which has been read. If any gentleman desires further explanation of it, I stand prepared to give it.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I would like to know the number of these Indians.

Mr. ELLIS. There are fifteen thousand of them.

Mr. CHACE. To what tribes do they belong?

Mr. ELLIS. The Blackfeet, Piegans, Crows, Assinaboines, and Gros Ventres. The scenes of distress among those unfortunate people during the past summer were simply terrible, as they were shameful to our Government. And yet, when making the appropriations for the past year, we did not know the real condition of affairs. We did not know that the buffalo and other game which had in great part constituted the support of these tribes had disappeared, and therefore made a conscientious though inadequate appropriation. The appropriation for these Indians for 1883–'84 was about $196,000. To this we added in the first session of the present Congress $100,000, making in all $296,000. We gave for the present year, 1884–'85, $294,000. We believed it would be enough if properly administered, together with such crops as might be raised, to aid which, we gave money for purposes of irrigation and cultivation. But it seems that we did not give enough. There are no proofs of maladministration of the funds appropriated.

But even if there were, I would not pause to hold parley with revelations of fraud and peculation, but would move promptly to avert a repetition of the harrowing scenes of last year, when those unfortunate people were starving in sight and sound of sheaves of wheat and lowing herds.

Mr. Speaker, I have received from several sources letters asking why this appropriation was not more promptly made. To such I will reply that my attention was called to the matter of this emergency just before the holiday adjournment, when there was not time to ascertain from the Indian Office the real facts upon which this appropriation was asked, and the people, whose servants we are and whose treasure we expend, had the right to know fully the occasion of this and of every expenditure.

Besides, I knew that there was ample time after the holidays to provide and forward the necessary relief. No citizen of this country, no member of the Indian Relief Association, shall go before me in appreciation of the duties we owe the Indian or in prompt movement for his relief. I have thought it proper to say this much on this occasion; and now, if no gentleman desires to be heard or to ask further information, I will move the adoption of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I now ask that the documents which I send to the desk, and which serve to explain more fully the circumstances on which this joint resolution is based, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The documents are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 3, 1885.

SIR: Referring to your verbal request to be furnished with a statement of the necessity for the deficiency appropriation of $50,000 required for the Indians in Montana, what tribes are to be benefited by it, &c., I have the honor to state that the appropriation asked for is required for the support of the following tribes: Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans, located at Blackfeet agency; Assinaboines, Yanctonais Sioux, &c., located at Fort Peck agency; Crows, located at Crow agency; Gros Ventres and Assinaboines, located at Fort Belknap agency; numbering, as per reports for 1883, over 15,000 Indians.

In the estimate submitted to Congress for the support of these Indians for the fiscal year 1885, the sum of $366,700 was asked for. After the estimates were made and printed a communication was received from Agent Armstrong, of the Crow agency, strongly urging an increased appropriation for supplies for his Indians for 1885, and on the 7th of January last the honorable Secretary of the Interior transmitted to Congress letter from this office of the 5th of January, together with copy of letter from Agent Armstrong, and requested that the estimate for the Crows for supplies for 1885 be increased from $65,000 to $90,000 (see Senate Ex. Doc. No. 42, Forty-eighth Congress, first session), thus making the amount estimated for the Indians named $391,700. The amount appropriated by Congress for the fiscal year is $296,000, or $95,700 less than estimated for.

The necessity for increased appropriation for the support of the Montana Indians arises from the total destruction of the game. In former years the prairies supplied these Indians with everything they needed, and up to two years ago the Indians were almost able to support themselves by hunting. But now the situation is changed; the game is gone, but the Indian is not sufficiently civilized to support himself. In addition, the Crows have only within the last year been moved from their old agency to the new location near Fort Custer. They are doing as well as can be expected of them, but for the next few years will be unable to support themselves. I am, however, satisfied that if the Government should furnish them with a sufficient ration for the next five years to keep them from want and enable them to engage in agriculture, they will, at the end of that time, require but little help from the Government.

For the information of the committee, I inclose herewith copies of letters from the agents at Crow, Blackfeet, and Fort Peck agencies, bearing on this subject, as well as telegrams from the Board of Trade of Helena, Mont., and the governor of Montana.

Very respectfully,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

Hon. E. JOHN ELLIS,
Chairman subcommittee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Blackfeet Agency, Montana, August 11, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of the 9th instant, asking for facts in regard to the starving condition of the Indians at this agency, I have the honor to state the following:

Under date of June 4, 1884, I wrote your office reviewing the estimate for supplies made by my predecessor, John Young, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and showed that the amount of meat estimated for was only one-fourth the quantity required, and that of flour only about one-third the quantity required. He asked for 500,000 pounds beef gross, and only 400,000 pounds have been purchased—less than one-fifth rations, or less than five ounces per day for each person. The flour purchased for the current fiscal year gives less than six ounces per day to each person. On such an allowance, having nothing else, how could they avoid starving? I telegraphed you that I have supplies for present needs. If I were to divide 400,000 pounds beef gross by fifty-two, the number of weeks in a year, and issue only that amount, the needs would not be met, but I am issuing more than that, and will continue to do so while I have it on hand, for these Indians shall not die of starvation while I have anything to give them. If the supplies run out the responsibility may rest where it belongs.

At present there is a great abundance of berries, and these help to prevent starvation, for the Indians gather and eat them in great quantities, but the berries will soon be gone and then there will be nothing but meat and flour. It should be borne in mind that at no time since I assumed charge of this agency has there been a single pound of rice, beans, hominy, oatmeal, or anything of that kind to give the Indians. Do you wonder that it is reported they are starving? In May and June there were times when they stripped the trees and ate the inner bark to keep their souls and bodies together, and all the time they were begging for food. Does that look as though they were in a starving condition? I at one time issued over two thousand pounds of bacon that I had not receipted for and that had been condemned by a board of survey. I would never have done so had they not been in a starving condition.

Just now they are not suffering, but in a very short time the berries will be gone and supplies will run low, and the carpenter will again be kept busy making burial boxes unless something can be done in the way of getting them additional food.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. A. ALLEN,
United States Indian Agent.

Hon. E. L. STEVENS,
Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

FORT CUSTER, MONT., December 5, 1884.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

Although only ordered to inspect the annuity goods and witness the issue, I think it my duty to report to the department commander that the Crow Indians are only issued half rations of beef and that the bacon at seven-tenths of a pound per ration issued every six weeks will only last forty-eight weeks of the year, or until the last of May. The above I think are the figures given me. The Indian agent, Major Armstrong, has written a very urgent letter to his Department upon the subject, in which he stated that he was afraid the Indians by starvation would be driven to commit depredations upon their own (the Government) herd or upon citizen herds, which would most likely lead to further and more serious trouble.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. FORSE, Captain First Cavalry.

The ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Department of Dakota, Fort Snelling, Minn.,
Through Post Commander.

UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Crow Agency, Mont., December 2, 1884.

SIR: I am very sorry indeed to annoy you again in regard to the insufficient supply of beef and bacon for this agency, but I dread to cut down the ration of beef below what we are now issuing (one and one-half pounds gross), and I feel that I must give due notice of the following facts: While it is well known that the Crows have always been friendly with the whites and never given the Government any trouble, there have been and are a few chiefs and leaders among them who in their hearts are really hostile. They have never been able to do any harm simply because the great majority of Crows have held them back. These evil-disposed Indians have been visiting the Sioux this summer and brought the Sioux here to visit the Crows. Now I really believe that if the Government is going to starve these people, the well-disposed Crows, who are in the majority, will go over to the minority, and there will be trouble.

I can not believe that the Indians at Wolf Point and at the Blackfeet agency suffered last winter as they were reported to have suffered. I should have thought they would have broken out and gone to war.

I am certain the Crows will not quietly sit down and suffer so. If they are starved they will fight. It is true they have a liberal allowance of flour for this fiscal year, but they are always hungry if they have no meat, and if I reduce the ration so as to make our supply hold out until we can get some on next year's contract they will receive almost none each week.

By issuing seven-tenths of a pound of bacon (which is almost nothing for a grown person for one week) once in six weeks, the total amount allowed us will not last through the year.

Can it be possible that for the sake of saving a few thousand dollars the Government will drive a people who are so well disposed as these have always been into a state of hostility? It is a common saying among white men who are best acquainted with the Crows that they will never go to war unless they are driven to it by starvation; and the same men will tell the honorable Commissioner in the next breath that they believe the Indians will fight before they will allow themselves to be starved.

I have shown in more than one letter, and especially by my letter of January 10, how funds to purchase the additional supplies needed can and ought to be provided from the moneys due the Crows. There is no reason why the supplies should be a gratuity. The Indians will be very glad to have a part of their moneys expended in purchasing the additional supplies. I beg that the honorable Commissioner will call upon the beef contractor for the additional 25 per cent. as provided for by the terms of the contract, and that he will also purchase 20,000 pounds more bacon for us.

I think it is too soon to crowd the Crows too far. I date the beginning of their farming operations from the past season. Nothing had been done at the time of my arrival at this agency, and the first two seasons after I came were thrown away because it was useless to try to place them on their homesteads so long as the question of their removal to this part of the reservation was undecided; so that they are really only partially to be blamed for not raising better crops than they have this past season.

If they are crowded, as we shall have to crowd them unless we get a further allowance of beef and bacon, I think the certain result will be that they will kill a great many of their stock cattle, a great many cattle belonging to stockmen in the surrounding country, and that it will cause them to be so nearly hostile that they will not try to farm much next season. The result may even be more serious. I believe they ought to be allowed one-half the established ration of beef for this fiscal year.

I hope we may get it, but if not will issue in such quantities as will make the cattle we now have last until the middle of July, no matter what the result may be.

I would be very much obliged if I could have a reply to this important matter soon.

Very respectfully,

H. J. ARMSTRONG,
United States Indian Agent.

Hon. H. PRICE,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Fort Peck Agency, August 11, 1884.

SIR: Referring to office letter under date of July 14, 1884, wherein is stated the amount of subsistence supplies to be furnished this agency for the fiscal year 1885, and directing me to divide said supplies into fifty-two equal parts, and to issue one of said parts to my Indians each week during the year. As regards the amount of flour to be furnished (500,000 pounds) I would respectfully inform you that it will be impossible for me to keep my Indians on that amount and do the vast amount of work we have to do, and at the same time pay them for their labor in supplies. The 500,000 pounds of flour furnished for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, will be about one hundred pounds per capita for the year; but if I must divide my supplies into fifty-two equal parts, and issue one fifty-second part each week, as directed in your order of July 14, it will militate against our work; in fact I can not work the Indians on two pounds of flour per week.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. E. SNIDER,
United States Indian Agent.

Hon. H. PRICE,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

HELENA, MONT., August 8, 1884.

Hon. HENRY M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior:

Recent reliable information comes before this board that while the death-rate among the families of the Blackfeet Indians in Montana from want of food is not so great as in the preceding month of July, still the famishing condition and death-rate among the several tribes of the Blackfeet Nation are such at this time that immediate relief by your Department is demanded by every instinct of humanity and justice. The wailings of distress among the men, women, and children who have survived the cruel and inhuman famine cry aloud for food with such an appeal that their lamentations should be heeded by yourself without waiting for the slow process of feeding by contractors according to the usual mode at agencies far remote from your official observation.

A. M. HOLTER,
Vice-President of the Helena Board of Trade.

By order of the executive committee.

ROBERT C. WALKER, Secretary.

HELENA, MONT., August 29, 1884.

Hon. HENRY M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Urquhart, my special agent sent to investigate the condition of the Piegans at the Blackfeet agency, has just returned. These Indians have been slowly wasting away and dying for years for want of food, and the present ration of two pounds of beef and three of flour once a week is insufficient to sustain life in their present weak condition. Agent Allen's instructions from Commissioner Price forbid a larger issue; death averages 1 daily out of total of 2,000; game has disappeared and only ten acres land cultivated, and this small ration is the only means of subsistence, as the appropriation is inadequate for supplying daily wants of Piegans for fiscal year. I urge, in view of their desperate condition, the issuing of full rations until Congress meets in December. As Governor of Montana, in the name of her people, I protest against keeping the nation's wards within the limits of this Territory in such a pitiable, starving condition; humanity and justice demand their immediate relief.

JNO. SCHUYLER CROSBY, Governor.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of $50,000 from the Interior Department to supply deficiency in the appropriation for the support of Indians of the Blackfeet, Crow, Fort Belknap, and Fort Peck agencies for the current fiscal year.

DECEMBER 17, 1884.—Referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 17, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, an estimate received from the Secretary of the Interior to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the current fiscal year for support of the Indians of the Blackfeet, Crow, Fort Belknap, and Fort Peck agencies, amounting to $50,000.

Very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 17, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to request that the item of $50,000 for the support of the Indians of the Blackfeet, Crow, Fort Belknap, and Fort Peck agencies, included in the estimate of deficiencies for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and forwarded to your Department December 15, may be taken from said estimate and transmitted to Congress at the earliest practicable moment.

The appropriation for this purpose for the present year was insufficient.

This Department instructed the agent of the Blackfeet Indians to exhaust his supplies on the 21st of March, so as to increase the food issue by three months, trusting to an immediate appropriation by Congress.

Supplies must be sent in by January 15, 1885, or the chances are that they can not pass over the roads before the middle of June.

Immediate action should be taken, or starvation will ensue.

Very respectfully,

M. L. JOSLYN, Acting Secretary.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Support of Indians of Blackfeet, Crow, Fort Belknap, and Fort Peck agencies, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, $50,000.

NOTE.—The sum of $100,000 was appropriated for this object by joint resolution of February 8, 1884 (23 Stat., p. 267).

Several members called for the regular order.

MORNING HOUR DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. RANDALL. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, in the chair.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the House take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask that the clerk also read the report of the Committee on Appropriations which accompanies it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 7676) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, submit the following report in explanation of the accompanying bill, which is submitted as a substitute therefor:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found on page 139 of the Book of Estimates for 1886, and amount to $60,000,000.

The accompanying bill appropriates $59,976,000, apportioned as follows:

For the payment of pensions	$59,172,000
For fees of examining surgeons	500,000
For salaries of pension agents	48,000
For fees for vouchers and allowances to pension agents	253,000
For contingent expenses of pension agencies	3,000

The amount for examining surgeons is the same as was given for the current year; for pay and allowances of pension agents an increase of $1,000 is made; and for contingent expenses of pension agencies a decrease of $7,000 under the current year is made.

The direct appropriations from the Treasury on account of pensions for the current fiscal year amounted to $20,810,000. The amount reappropriated from unexpended balances for the same purpose is estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions to have been $68,250,000; making the total sum available for pensions for the year a little in excess of $89,000,000. Of this sum it is estimated there will remain an unexpended balance of $30,000,000 at the close of the fiscal year, which, under the operations of section 3690, Revised Statutes, will be carried to the surplus fund of the Treasury.

Section 4755 of the Revised Statutes provides that Navy pensions shall be paid out of the "Navy pension fund" upon an appropriation by Congress, so far as the same may be sufficient.

The naval pension fund at present amounts to $14,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and is created under the provisions of sections 4751 and 4752 of the Revised Statutes.

The payments on account of Navy pensions during the fiscal year 1884 aggregated $750,696.97.

The compensation of pension agents is fixed by the act of June 14, 1878 (Supplement to the Revised Statutes, pp. 347 and 348), and by the act of July 4, 1884. (Statutes at Large, vol. 23, p. 99.)

The compensation of examining surgeons is fixed at $2 for each examination by section 4 of the act of July 25, 1882. (Statutes at Large, vol. 22, pp. 175 and 176.)

New legislation is recommended in the bill, as follows:

* * * * * * *

"And hereafter each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day: Provided, That if twenty or more applicants appear on one day, no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, twenty or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until twenty examinations shall have been made.

* * * * * * *

"And from and after July 1, 1885, there shall be no more than twelve agents for payment of pensions; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

* * * * * * *

"That from and after March 4, 1885, the salary and emoluments of agents for the payment of pensions shall be $4,000, and no more, per annum; and of the fees, provided by law for vouchers prepared and paid, only so much thereof as may be required for expenses incurred in having said vouchers prepared, as well as the necessary clerical work at the agencies, shall be available."

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this bill I have little, almost nothing, to say in reference to anything outside of the new legislation proposed by the committee, and upon that I shall not detain the House but for a few moments. The total estimates for 1866 were $60,000,000, apportioned as set forth in the various paragraphs according to the direction of the Commissioner of Pensions. The amount appropriated is $24,000 less than the estimates, so that the total amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill is $59,976,000.

The new legislation proposed contemplates in the first instance a change in the law providing compensation for examining surgeons. I will state this is with the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions. As the law now stands these examining surgeons get $2 for the examination of each applicant for a pension. That law is proposed to be amended so as to give $2 for each one application up to the number of five with the proviso that if twenty or more applicants appear on o e day no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day; and that if fewer examinations be made, twenty more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only, until twenty examinations shall have been made. I presume this is a fair and just compensation for the labor required to be performed.

I do not wish to criticise the law on the subject, but I will be pardoned, I am sure, when I say, with the utmost deference to everybody, that probably the surgeon who can trace back the causes of chronic diseases twenty or twenty-five years ought, I think, to be entitled to the compensation here provided. But, it seems to me, it is an unsafe practice on the part of the Government to rely upon any such theory, while at the same time it is a strong temptation, in my judgment, to imposition and fraud.

Our pension-roll is growing to enormous proportions, and it ought I think to arrest the attention of those who would guard the people's money from being squandered for unworthy objects. We are now expending for pensions alone more than double as much annually as was necessarily expended by the General Government from 1840 to 1850, and it is difficult to say where it is to stop when it is looked upon as a powerful lever by many members of the House to secure a succession to their seats upon this floor. [Laughter.]

Now, I am in favor of pensions to every worthy object, but I do not think it the part of wisdom for any legislative body to hold out temptations to fraud and perjury. When you talk to me about a physician being able to go back for twenty or twenty-five years and trace disease to what occurred in the discharge of the line of duty, I must be permitted to question any one's skill to that extent.

Perhaps these remarks might better have been left unsaid. But, Mr. Chairman, it is a source of gratification sometimes to speak out what we really feel; and while I have as much sympathy as any man should have for those who deserved its bounty, I nevertheless think we are going too far and too fast in this direction.

Another provision proposed by this bill in the way of new legislation is in reference to the compensation of the agent as the law now is. It is contended and shown by very satisfactory testimony that many of these gentlemen get from $7,000 to $14,000 per annum. They get $4,000 for the first 4,000 certificates made out. This bill proposes to limit the compensation and make it uniform at $4,000 to each one of these agents, and that any excess that may be received for issuing certificates shall remain in the Treasury and not be drawn save for specific appropriations made under the bill.

I think this would commend itself to the approval of all parties, for it seems to me that a man whose time is not wholly occupied, who has an opportunity of remaining at home for the larger part of his time, ought to be satisfied with a compensation of $4,000 as a remuneration for the services rendered to his country.

Another provision of the bill is that the number of agents shall be reduced from eighteen, as now, to twelve, and to be apportioned or distributed over the country by the President, as he is authorized to do by the laws now in force. I have not much to say about this matter, as I may not understand it so thoroughly as many others; but on consultation with the officials of the Department I am satisfied that the pensioners could all be paid off with no longer delay than perhaps an average of three and one-half days for the more distant States, California, Oregon, and others, and that would only relate to the first payment, for afterward they would get their quarterly payments as now without any delay. I do not know how much would be saved, but according to the estimates submitted from the Department I assume that it will be in the neighborhood of $98,000. In reference to the question of fees, as that mode was condemned by the last House, it is not brought before this but dropped out in deference to the action then taken.

A change is made, however, as I have stated, in the number of the agents and in their remuneration.

These, Mr. Chairman, are all of the points of new legislation embodied in this bill, but I have no disposition to occupy the time of the committee further, and will therefore yield the floor for twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], reserving the remainder of my own time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Before taking the floor I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is his purpose to open the bill for general discussion; and, if so, what length of time it is proposed to allow.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have not thought of any general discussion on the bill further than that we might perhaps occupy one hour. I hoped that we would be able to get through in that time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well; then I will occupy the twenty minutes at this time courteously yielded to me by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to what I deem to be a very important matter in connection with the law relating to fees in pension cases passed at the last session of Congress, and the abuses, if I may be permitted to use that term, that have grown up under that law. It will be remembered that an amendment was offered by yourself, Mr. Chairman [Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas], under instructions from the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, amending the law relating to the fees of claim agents.

That amendment was incorporated in the appropriation bill and passed the House, and just here I would be glad to have for a few minutes the attention of such gentlemen as have not before had their attention called to this matter. This bill as it passed the House repealed the law of June 20, 1878, and re-enacted the law of 1870 as far as relates to the collection of fees of claim agents. The law of 1878, it will be remembered, permitted claim agents to collect their fees before the allowance of the claim. The law of 1870 prohibited that and provided for the payment of the fees out of the claim after it had been allowed.

Under the act of 1878, abuses had grown up. Claim agents here in Washington had succeeded in getting a large number of claims in their hands, and as soon as they obtained control of them set themselves to work to obtain all the fees they could. Ten dollars which the law allowed, if they could get it all; if they could not get $10, then $5, and if they could not get five then two or one or any other sum that they could worm out of the claimants, and after getting all the fees they could, some of these agents—not all of them, but some of them—threw the papers in the cases aside and never even filed them in the Pension Office, abandoning both claims and claimants.

In some cases the papers were transferred to another claim agent, who in turn proceeded in the same way, and who perhaps in the end abandoned them again. To prevent such abuses the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay recommended the re-enactment of that part of the law of 1870 providing that fees in such cases should not be demanded or received till the claim had been allowed. The bill further provided that on a written contract, approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, a fee of $25, instead of $10, might be allowed in cases filed after the passage of the act. In this form the bill went through the House. It carefully excluded all claims that were filed under the act of June 20, 1878; that is to say, all claims filed subsequent to the passage of that act and prior to the passage of the act in question were excluded from the provisions of the bill.

It was stated here in debate, stated by the gentleman who now occupies the chair, that the bill as reported and adopted by the House was in no way retroactive. I stated also, as the RECORD will show, that it did not cover any cases filed under the old law, and did not affect claims filed after June 20, 1878, and prior to the passage of this act. That was the understanding of the House at the time of the passage of the bill. That provision of the bill was stricken out in the Senate, and in the conference committee a provision differing very materially from the amendment as it passed the House was incorporated in the bill. The bill in this way was so changed as to become retroactive, and was made to cover all cases on file in the Pension Office—that is to say, all cases filed after June 20, 1878—amounting in effect to a blanket mortgage upon all the claims on file in the Pension Office for the benefit of these claim agents. I characterize it as one of the grossest abuses ever practiced upon pension claimants. As made use of by claim agents, I say it is an unmitigated outrage on all soldiers or their widows who had claims pending in the Pension Office when this act became a law.

It is due to my friend from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] for me to say—and I only presume what I am about to say, for I have no authority from him to say it—but I presume the gentleman from Texas in the conference committee having charge of this bill generously left that provision to the distinguished soldier of the other House on the committee with him; nor is it to be presumed for a moment that the distinguished soldier referred to or any one else on the committee understood what the amendment offered in the conference committee and finally adopted really meant. But the claim agent—and I think I am safe in assuming that some claim agent proposed the amendment—knew perfectly well what it meant and what it would accomplish. He knew it would be worth $7,000,000 to the claim agents to have that become a law and made to cover all the claims on file at that time in the office, to say nothing of those to be filed after the passage of the act.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but that bill makes the Government a collector for these claim agents of old, stale claims. It actually requires the Pension Office to put its clerical force to work for them to go over claims long ago allowed, and collect from the pensioners the fees which the agent last of record claims that he has not received. Let me illustrate this by a case which came to my knowledge during the vacation at my own home: A pensioner called on me who receives a pension of $2 a month, $24 a year, and which he has been receiving, I believe, since 1878 or 1879. He found when his certificate should have come to him for the last quarter that there had been deducted from his pension all that was coming to him for that quarter, the $6, and that he was left still $4 in debt, to be taken out of the next quarter's pension. He said he had paid one claim agent $10 and another $5. This one claims to be the last agent and that he never received his $10; and under this law the Commissioner of Pensions is required to use the clerical force of his office to hunt up and adjudicate all such old claims; he has to put his clerks to work to find out what is due to these agents.

And from a communication which I hold in my hand from the Pension Office I learn that 20,000 cases of this kind have already been adjudicated, and the fee of $10 in each case paid; that pensioners who have been receiving their pensions under certificates for a number of years find themselves mulcted in the sum of $10 for the benefit of these agents, no matter how much has been paid to other claim agents. Twenty thousand cases of this kind, I say, have been already settled under this law. Thus $200,000 have been taken from widows and invalid soldiers by the Government through its own agencies and paid over to a lot of claim agents. Could a greater outrage be perpetrated on needy pensioners? The whole business of the Pension Office is retarded and impeded that claim agents at Washington may be satisfied.

Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion piracy in the Middle Ages on honest commerce was an honest calling compared with some of the operations of claim agents in this city on the pensioners and claimants for pensions under this law. There have been already filed in the office under this law about 90,000 contracts, every one of which must be filed with the claim to which it relates. I mean now the old claims—claims on file before the passage of this act, and consequently under previous agreements expressed or understood. There have been allowed of these claims, to which the fee of $25 attaches, about 10,000, amounting in fees to $250,000; making, with the $200,000 collected from those before receiving pensions, $450,000. And there are other claims about to be settled which will swell the sum probably to $750,000 before this bill can become a law. The cost to the Government of the blank checks alone used by the agent in paying these attorneys' fees has already amounted, I am told, to $4,000; and altogether the cost to the Government of collecting and paying over these fees will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. Think of $750,000 taken from invalid soldiers and their widows by the Government and paid over to the claim agents who infest the city of Washington.

These pension agents, Mr. Chairman, or some of them, seem to think or talk as if they thought Congress was under their control. And I dare say they do prepare four-fifths of all the bills relating to claims that are introduced in Congress, and they are bold to affirm what Congress will and what it will not do in matters of pension legislation. They act as though Congress would not presume to do otherwise than obey their behests. There is scarcely a petition that comes to either House relating to these questions that has not its origin with some claim agent here. They form associations; they have their bureau; they send out circulars, and assail any member of Congress who does not respond to their demands. They claim to be the friends of soldiers. They are friends of soldiers, as their raids under this law show, as the wolf is the friend of the sheep. And I imagine now that they are chuckling not only over the fact that they are gathering the fleeces of the soldiers, but that they are making the Government do the shearing for them. For under this law we are not only corralling the soldiers for them, or gathering them into their fold, but we are doing the shearing for them with the force in the Pension Office.

If I have time left in the twenty minutes allowed me, I desire to make an analysis of the law showing more in detail the difference between the act as it passed the House and as it finally became a law. But before doing that I desire to refer to the methods resorted to to secure contracts covering old claims on file when the law went into effect. It may be claimed perhaps that these are voluntary contracts made by the soldier with the claim agent, and therefore we have nothing to do with them, but the truth is the claim agent makes the soldier believe that these contracts are required of him by law, and that he must sign them and return them to the agent.

Let me call attention to a circular that has come into my hands which one of these agents sent out.

Remember—

He says to the claimant—

both fee agreements inclosed herewith must be executed and returned promptly to us in accordance with the requirements of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Conveying to the claimant the idea that the Commissioner of Pensions requires them to execute the agreements. This circular is sent out by Soulé & Co. In another circular sent out they say:

By the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 4, 1884, it was made unlawful, from and after that date, for any claim agent or any other person to charge an advance fee in a pension claim. The fee, which, since June 30, 1878, has been $10, is fixed at $25 under the new law, provided these duplicates are signed.

These circulars are sent out to claimants with the agreements to be signed.

I will not stop to read all the circulars that I have, but here is one sent out by George E. Lemon:

Why do you not execute and return the articles of agreement, or state your reasons for not doing so? Very few of my clients have failed to execute the contracts as authorized by law.

"Why do you not execute and return the contracts," he says. Claimants are thus led to believe that they can not get their claims allowed unless they do sign the articles of agreement.

Please comply with my request by promptly executing both the articles of agreement and return them to me at once.

Mr RANDALL. That circular is from the editor of the soldiers' paper?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; this is from the editor of the soldiers' paper—the Tribune, I believe it is called—the would-be friend of the soldier. This is the agent who bought out the Fitzgeralds, I believe, at least he says so in one of his circulars. After the Fitzgeralds had fleeced the soldiers by getting hold of their cases, collecting all the fees they could, they sold out their claims to Lemon, who, as I am informed, paid $20,000 for them.

Now he gets a law passed by Congress which gives him $25 on each one of these claims. What is that worth? You can figure it up very quickly. Supposing there were 20,000 claims at $25 each, they would amount to half a million dollars. A pretty good speculation, it would seem, since Congress has helped him out in it by giving him the use of the machinery of the Government and the clerical force of the Pension Office to make up and collect his claims for him.

A claim agent who has 10,000 claims allowed and receives $10 in each case makes $100,000. The increase of $15 in each case makes it $250,000. The $150,000 is virtually given him by an act of Congress; that is, the Government takes it from the soldiers and their widows and gives it to the claim agent.

In justice to the Commissioner of Pensions it should be said that no discretion is left him, and I do not see how he can do otherwise than he is doing, or how he can put any other interpretation on the law than he has given it. I think he has only followed the law; he could do nothing else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would be glad to have a little further time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will give the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not get through in five minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK. Then I will reserve the residue of my time, and the gentleman from Ohio can now take the floor in his own right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well; then I will take the floor in my own right. I was about to say that the Commissioner of Pensions in his interpretation of the law makes it apply to all claims on file, whether the agent who gets the $35 has done anything in the case or not. Though a claim may be entirely completed, if even the certificate has issued but has not yet received the final signature of the treasurer, and the new agreement overtakes it before the final signature is affixed, the lien attaches and the $25 is paid to the attorney or agent.

This is the retroactive feature of the law which the House was assured when the act passed the House was not in the bill, and it was not. As it passed the House the bill excluded in specific terms all claims filed under any previous act; the bill was made operative only from and after its passage.

I am further informed that it probably takes now about 5 per cent. of the entire clerical force of the Pension Office to execute this law, for the sole benefit of the claim agents who are reaping out of it a rich harvest. For instance, the 90,000 contracts which have come in had to be filed with the claims to which they relate. The claims must all be hunted up and these contracts filed with them. Then there are always 5,000 or 6,000 claims passing from one division to another which are not on the files. Clerks must be detailed to follow these up. This is more labor, a great deal, than to file them with claims that have not been removed. Clerks must follow these claims up and attach the contracts to them—see that they do not get through before the lien under the new contract attaches. Five per cent., I say at least 5 per cent. of the clerical force of the office is required, according to the estimates given me, to carry out the provisions of that law; and the only beneficiaries are the claim agents. The Government does all this work for nothing, takes from the soldiers and gives to the claim agent for nothing; and all because the claim agent likes to have it so.

But the worst feature of the law is that it requires the Government to go back six or eight years, and if an attorney says he has not had his fee, although other attorneys may have had fees, whether he has done anything in the case or not, the Government undertakes to hunt up his claim for him, adjudicate it, and collect his fee from the pensioner for him. Why should the Government do this?

That is a retroactive feature of the law which I think will condemn it in the eyes of every member of the House.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to a comparison of the bill as it passed the House and as it passed the conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I was about to ask the gentleman from Ohio to make such a statement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have a full abstract of the differences made out. Here it is:

Attorneys' fees in pension cases, abstract of act of July 4, 1884, first session Forty-eighth Congress, page 99.

Section 1 of the law (being section 4785 of the Revised Statutes), which I have before me, provides that "no attorney shall demand or receive for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land any other compensation than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25."

That section of the law as it now stands in the bill reported from the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] who now occupies the chair, and which is here called the Rogers bill, provided that the fee should be $10 except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner, in which cases a claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner might prescribe, for a fee not exceeding $25. Now comes in the exception: Except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the passage of the act, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for.

This provision would prevent allowing contracts already made to be increased, or new contracts made in cases pending after June 28, 1878; but the act of July 4 makes no such provision, but, on the contrary, expressly allows the attorney to make a new contract for the larger fee, provided it was a case in which a contract might be filed, although the repealing clause makes a saving as to contracts in pending cases under the act of 1870. The present law also provides that "no part of such compensation shall be demanded or paid until the pension claim is allowed." The bill reported from the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, the Rogers bill, contained a similar provision (section 2), and also the further provision that all fees in pension claims should be paid out of the first installment of pension due by the agent paying the claim, and no fee should be paid except through this agent.

The present law further provides that in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, the same shall be deducted from the pension, and the agent for paying pensions shall pay the same to the recognized attorney. This provision virtually makes the Pension Office a collection agency for stale attorney fees. There is no provision of the kind in the Rogers bill.

The present law provides that the attorney may cause to be filed with the Commissioner duplicate article of agreement, duly executed and verified, without additional cost to the claimant; setting forth the fee agreed upon by the parties; and where no agreement is filed the fee shall be $10, and no more.

The provisions of the Rogers bill on this subject have already been given.

Section 4 of the present law (being section 4786 Revised Statutes) provides that agreements are allowed to be filed in the following cases only:

First. Original pensions.

Second. Claims for increase on account of new disability.

Third. Claims for restoration where name has been dropped on testimony taken by special examiner, showing that disability or cause of death for which pension was allowed did not originate in the line of duty.

Fourth. In claims of dependent relatives whose names have been dropped on like testimony upon the ground of non-dependence.

Fifth. Such other cases of difficulty and trouble as the Commissioner of Pensions may see fit to recognize.

The Rogers bill does not classify the cases in which contracts may be filed, but merely designates the class of cases in which the fee shall not exceed $10.

The fourth section of the present law further provides that in cases where contracts are filed and it appears that the claimant had paid any sum to the attorney prior to the execution of the contract, and the amount so paid is not stipulated in the contract, then the claim is to be adjudicated as though no contract had been filed; and the amount which the claimant can show has been paid is to be deducted from the fee of $10 allowed by law.

This provision is in the nature of a penalty for failure to specify in the contract the amount previously received by the attorney. There does not seem to be any provision anywhere for the deduction of the amount paid in all cases.

In the Rogers bill it was provided that in all claims filed prior to the passage of the act the attorney shall file a statement under oath showing the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount so received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by the act. To willfully and knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount received subjected the attorney to the penalty prescribed by the act.

The present law provides that no greater fee than $10 shall be allowed (1) in any claim granted by a special act; or (2) in claims for increase on account of increase of disability for which pension had been granted. You see, they only ask a fee of $10 where Congress passes a special act. They are considerate. Ten dollars only for a special act. The Rogers bill provided that no greater fee than $10 shall be allowed (1) in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged; (2) in cases for pensions for service; (3) in all claims filed after June 28, 1878, and prior to the passage of the act.

No fee is allowed by the present law in any claim for arrears, as arrears of increase allowed by any act of Congress passed subsequent to the date of allowance of the original claim in which such arrears, or of arrears of increase, may be allowed.

The Rogers bill contains no provision of this kind. The penalty clause of the present law is the same as section 6 of the Rogers bill, except the omission of the part applying to an attorney who shall "willfully and knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received;" also except the fine is reduced from $1,000 to $500, and the phrase "and be forever debarred from practicing in the Pension Office" is omitted.

Section 5 of the present law is the same as section 5 of the Rogers bill, with a few verbal changes.

Section 6 of the act (which is found substantially in section 4 of the Rogers bill) gives the Commissioner power, subject to review by the Secretary of the Interior, to reject or refuse to recognize any contract for fees whenever it shall be made to appear that any undue advantage has been taken of the claimant in respect to his contract.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman if this provision of the law to which he refers—

Provided, however, That the rights of the parties shall not be abridged or affected as to contracts in pending cases as provided for under said act, but such contracts shall be deemed to be and remain in full force and virtue, and shall be recognized as contemplated by said act—whether that provision does not fix the fee at $10 in each case for claims filed prior to the passage of the act?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions do not so interpret it. The attention of the Department was called to that section referring to the act of 1870, and the Commissioner has decided that it does not prevent making a new contract with the claimant.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is, of course, if they are willing; but suppose that they refuse to make a new contract, are they not protected by the act?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of course, if they choose to decline; but I have shown that in all such cases the claim agents make the claimants believe that it is absolutely necessary for them to sign the contract, and the claimants believe that if they do not sign the new contracts they will not get their pension.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But as a matter of law is not the claimant absolutely protected by that proviso—that he can not be compelled to execute a new contract and that the claim agent must finish the application for the $10 paid?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. He can not be legally compelled, of course, but practically they are compelled in the manner that I have stated.

Mr. GREENLEAF. As a matter of fact some 90,000 new contracts have been made in the face of that act.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, about 90,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not questioning the right of the matter. I agree that it ought not to be done, but what I do contend is that the law prohibits it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is done in the manner I have suggested, notwithstanding the law.

The main difference, Mr. Chairman, between the law as it now stands and the bill as it passed the House is in its application to the claims already on file. The present law amounts practically to a lien on all claims on file in the Pension Office at the date of the passage of the act, and adds $15 to the fee of the claim agent in many cases where they have done no service at all for the $15. It is an act of spoliation upon the invalid soldiers of the country, and their widows and orphans. And yet these pension agents are claiming to be the friends of the soldiers. They are friends just as wolves are friends to the sheep they seek to devour. They approach the soldiers in sheep's clothing for the purpose of robbing and plundering them.

Now, I propose, Mr. Chairman, the following amendment to the pension appropriation bill. I will send it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read, and I ask the attention of the House to it. After the reading I will explain one or two features of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. No agent or attorney or other person shall demand or receive a greater fee than $10 for services rendered in behalf of any claimant for pension or bounty land under any law of the United States, and it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney or other person to demand or receive any part of such fee until the claim for pension or bounty land shall have been allowed, and in case of pensions such fee shall be paid to the attorney of record out of the first installment due the claimant by the agent paying the pension, and in no other way: Provided, That in claims for pensions filed after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any agent or attorney, being a bona fide resident of the same State and county with the claimant, to contract in writing, in form to be approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, for a fee not exceeding $25, no part of which fee shall be demanded or received until the claim shall have been allowed, and then shall be paid only by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment due the pensioner; and it shall be unlawful for such agent, attorney, or other person, directly or indirectly, to enter into partnership for the purpose of dividing said fee of $25, or in any manner to divide said fee, with any agent or attorney or other person residing in any other county or State or in the District of Columbia; and any person found guilty of violating this provision shall, in addition to the penalty prescribed by this act, forfeit all right to such fee.

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall apply to and include all cases filed in the Pension Office between June 20, 1878, and July 4, 1884, whether contracts have been filed in the same or not, and which remain unsettled, and to all cases filed after the passage of this act; and in all cases where any part of the fee of $10 has been paid by the claimant to any agent or attorney of record in the case, the same shall be deducted from the fee of $10 allowed by this act; and if any agent or attorney shall neglect or abandon any claim intrusted to him, it shall be lawful for the claimant to employ another agent or attorney, and the agent or attorney who prosecutes the claim to final settlement shall be entitled to the fee.

SEC. 3. Any agent or attorney or other person who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive or retain any other or greater compensation for his services in behalf of a claimant for pension or bounty land than is herein provided shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall for every such offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $500 or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That so much of the act approved July 4, 1884, as relates to the fees of agents or attorneys, and all other acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect on its passage.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. MATSON. I ask if there is anything in that amendment saving pending prosecutions for violation of this act?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This amendment repeals the law of last July as far as it relates to cases remaining unsettled, but goes no further. We can not go back where cases have been settled and the money paid, but it repeals the law and makes void all contracts covering claims filed under the act of June 20, 1878, and down to July 4, 1884.

Mr. MATSON. I understand the last clause of the proposition is a general repealing clause.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; not a general repealing clause.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to know if there is anything in the amendment saving pending prosecutions.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It only repeals those provisions of the act of July 4, 1884, relating to the fees of agents, and other acts that may be in conflict with this act.

Mr. MATSON. It strikes me there ought to be an express saving of any offenses that may have been committed, so that the Government might prosecute hereafter.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It does not repeal the penalty clauses in other acts.

Mr. MATSON. It repeals the acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; those in conflict with this act. I am very glad to receive any suggestion, and will accept any amendments that will make this bill safer. But I desire to explain further the proposed amendment and its effect.

One object of the bill which passed the House last session was to get these cases out of the hands of the claim agents that infest this capital. We know very well how much of the private business that comes before Congress, and that is imposed upon members, has its origin with claim agents whose motives are to get fees, sometimes plunder. We know that they write four-fifths of all the pension bills and other private bills that are introduced into the House. The purpose in part, I say, of the act which passed the House last session was to get these claims out of the hands of agents here and induce claimants to employ reliable attorneys at home to do their work. These claim agents do little or no work in a claim. They write letters and collect fees and send out blanks, but all the work of preparing the evidence must be done by parties where the claimant resides, and that is largely done gratis now.

The idea was to offer sufficient inducement to attorneys throughout the country to induce them to assist these claimants in the preparation of their claims. For $10 they could not afford to do it where there are but few cases in a locality; but for $25 they could. Now it is proposed in this amendment to limit absolutely the fees to claim agents here in Washington to $10, to be paid only when the claims are allowed, but to allow a contract for $25 to be made with an attorney or claim agent resident in the county and State of the claimant, and only in such cases to allow a fee of $25.

Mr. RYAN. Will that allow the making of two contracts with two agents?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; there must be no double contracts. That is provided against. This claim business in Washington has become altogether too profitable. It brings too many agents here. There is too much money in it. Where the carcass is there the buzzards gather; and they are thick here in Washington. Make this business less profitable and there will be fewer of these agents here.

Mr. CURTIN. As I understand, the proposition advocated by the gentleman from Ohio will transfer this business to the locality where the pensioner lives.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIN. That is right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We propose to induce reputable, reliable attorneys at the homes of the claimant to take these cases. They have to get the work done for them now at home and the agents here get the fees. The practice now is for these claim agents at Washington to send out blanks and then instruct the claimant to write to his member of Congress, and the member or somebody else does the work. The Pension Office does most of the writing. The agents here do not do the work, but they get the fee of $25 now in each case.

Mr. RYAN. The only person who can be of any practical use to the claimant is the home attorney.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the fact, and there is very little use for pension agents here at all. I believe the soldier would be better off without them, and with attorneys at home to assist in preparing his evidence and the rest left to the Pension Office he would be much better off.

Mr. CURTIN. I will say to my friend that I have told hundreds of applicants in Pennsylvania not to sign these contracts at all.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am glad to learn that.

Mr. CURTIN. The gentleman properly denounces the mode of doing business as pursued by many of these agents as pillage of the soldier.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This amendment proposes to repeal so much of the act of July 4, 1884, as relates to the fees of claim agents. It is carried back to cover all cases on file and not now settled, whether there are contracts in the cases or not. This is upon the theory that the law of 1884 was retroactive; and we are only repealing that provision.

Mr. CURTIN. That is right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is retroactive and unjust. It permits the spoliation of the soldiers, and the claim agents have been very prompt in carrying it out. Ninety thousand cases are now on file and they are coming in at the rate of 20,000 or more a month. We propose to provide that by written contract attorneys at the home of the claimant may contract for a fee of $25, to be paid after the claim is allowed. These local attorneys can do the claimants some good. These agents here in Washington do them little or no good.

Mr. PERKINS. Would it not be well to make provision that the Commissioner of Pensions shall not honor any of these contracts which have been entered into pertaining to cases now pending?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I see no objection to that; but if the law is repealed these contracts by the proposed amendment are made null and void.

Mr. PERKINS. But the contracts are there on file.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will state that this amendment does not affect contracts covering claims which have been filed since July 4, 1884. Contracts covering claims filed since that date are not touched by this amendment; it allows them to stand. We would have no right, I take it, to abrogate such contracts.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether his amendment in the terms in which it is drawn will be operative immediately upon the passage of the act?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It will.

Mr. CURTIN. Is the gentleman quite clear in supposing that we have no right to abrogate these contracts made since July 4, 1884?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We assume that it would not be judicious legislation to undertake to abrogate contracts made after July 4, 1884, relating to claims filed after that date—claims filed under the new law. As to such claims we propose to allow contracts made since July 4, 1884, to stand. But we propose to abrogate all contracts relating to claims on file before the passage of the act, because that act itself was retroactive, and retroactive as to that class of claims against the interests of soldier claimants.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to say, unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question. I reserve the residue of my time, and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. In view of the statements which have been made, I think it proper to give a recital of the former action of the Committee on Appropriations and the House in relation to this subject. To this end I desire to insert in the RECORD the provisions originally recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and embraced in the last pension appropriation bill as originally reported from the Appropriations Committee. Section 2 of the bill as we reported it was in this language:

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the act entitled "An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases," approved the 20th day of June, A. D. 1878, be, and the same is hereby, made applicable to bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, and bounty-land cases, and pension cases in which arrears of pension are or shall be claimed or granted. And the fee of $10 prescribed by law shall not be payable to nor demanded or received by any agent or attorney in any pension case, whether for arrears or otherwise, or in any bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, or bounty-land case, in whole or in part, until such claim shall be allowed. Upon allowance of arrears of pension and pension cases the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct that the same be paid by the proper pension agent in the manner provided for in sections 4768 and 4769 of the Revised Statutes. And the provisions of section 5485 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to any person who shall violate this act.

I think I am warranted in saying that under these provisions none of the abuses complained of by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] would have occurred. But from abundance of caution, and deeming that the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay had given more thorough and exhaustive examination to this subject, the Committee on Appropriations gave up the provisions which they had recommended with the view to caring for the interests of the soldiers, and adopted the report of the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. The bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the current year therefore contained as it went to the Senate the following provisions, being, as I understand, in substance about the same as the proposition now submitted by the gentleman from Ohio:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions, out of the first installment of pension due the claimant; and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears of pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in case of special written contract filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 20, 1878, and prior to the passage of this act, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service, and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases. And such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or prospective claimant, by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney, or other person, instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or arrears thereof, who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, or receive, or retain, any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension or arrears thereof greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

The House is clear, in my judgment, from any censure for any participation in this alleged improper legislation. It went, therefore, the way the gentleman from Ohio desires it now to go, a year ago, to the Senate. The Senate disagreed altogether to any proposition or any legislation having in view the correction of the abuse which the House sought to remedy. They struck the House proposition out entirely. They said, in substance: No; we want no legislation. This is in effect the result of the action of the Senate at the time to which I allude.

When the question came back to the House the House still insisted that legislation was required, and what the gentleman from Ohio has indicated was the character of the legislation upon which the House insisted. When the matter got into conference the change was made and legislation was inserted under which fees were unnecessarily taken from soldiers making applications for pensions, and by which they were compelled to employ lawyers here in the city of Washington rather than at their homes.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the way in which this legislation came to be placed upon the statute-book. It was never dreamed by any one that such a condition of things would arise as that which has since occurred, and I have deemed it proper to recite the provisions of the bill as reported and sent to the Senate so that the record may be made up and this House relieved from any reflection whatever in connection with this subject.

Mr. WOODWARD. What was the date of the conference report?

Mr. RANDALL. The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations on the 22d of March, and it was first passed by the House on the 23d of May, I believe.

Mr. KEIFER. April 22.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The law was approved July 4.

Mr. WOODWARD. When was the conference committee?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The very last days, at the very close of the session.

Mr. RANDALL. At the very end of the session, I believe, when there was not that full and quiet opportunity to know everything in connection with the matter. I might say that the Committee on Appropriations had then parted with the subject, or rather had remitted it to the conference committee. It does seem we ought to have been able under the circumstances to have checked any such legislation getting through the House; but so it is.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman does not wish to shirk any responsibility, nor do I myself wish to shirk any responsibility in this matter. It never occurred to me that any change was made. Indeed I think I was not here. I have not looked up the record to see whether that is so or not. I did not know that any such amendment was made. I knew nothing about it. I do not wish to be exculpated from all blame in the matter. Still it could hardly be expected under the circumstances that it would have been noticed. I do not think I was here. I went to Chicago about that time. [Laughter.] Perhaps that is not a good excuse, however.

Mr. RANDALL. I had not that excuse, as I did not go to Chicago, but staid here until Congress adjourned, and I did not wish by any remark of mine to cast any reflection on any member of the House. I wished merely to state what was the current of legislation. I do not believe there is a member in either House who, if he had been advised this would have been the effect of what was enacted, would for an instant have advocated or voted for any such proposition. The truth is, in the hurry at the close of the session, under information derived, I suppose, from interested attorneys, we were led into the error. I do not wish to relieve myself entirely from blame in this particular, but I wish to say that the members here are not altogether censurable for having this legislation placed upon the statute-book.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did not in anything I said mean to make any reflection upon either House or upon any member of either House.

Mr. RANDALL. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to reflect in the slightest degree on any member of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not consider that the gentleman has reflected upon any member of the House, and I do not believe there is any occasion to do so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not believe any member of the Committee on Appropriations or any member of the House, if his attention had been called to the matter, would have sanctioned this legislation; but one thing is remarkable, where mistakes of this kind do creep into legislation they are always against the Government and in favor of somebody. Somebody always knows about them, and some one understood the effect in this case. I do not believe it was known on the part of any member of any committee of the House, or of any member of the House, but the mistake was made. And when such mistakes are made, as I have already said, they are always against the Government and in favor of somebody.

Now while I am on the floor I wish to add one further remark. I do it because my attention has been called by my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] to a publication sent out from this city by hundreds of thousands of copies to the soldiers of the country claiming specially and particularly to be the organ of the soldiers of the country. Soldiers do not know generally that it is sent out by claim agents, who have no other purpose than to gather into their hands all the claims of soldiers they can for the purpose of making as much as possible out of them.

A MEMBER. What paper is that?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is known as the National Tribune, published in this city. The soldiers do not understand, or did not understand, its character; but they are coming to understand it better. They are coming to know that it is merely an advertising sheet of certain claim agents. It seeks to exercise its influence through the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic, which is not a political organization, or is not intended to be, but almost always when one connected with this paper or any of this class of agents comes to the surface, whether as lobbyist in Congress or before some committee, it turns out somehow or other that he is a claim agent and has some ax to grind, and I place on record this statement for the reason that it ought to be known throughout the country what friends these people are in whose hands the soldiers of the country are falling.

I now, sir, yield the floor.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask to be recognized in my own right for the reason that I shall require something more than five minutes for what I wish to say. I happened to say on one occasion that the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay had proved the graveyard of all the important legislation committed to it; that it had never reported to the House for passage but a single bill, and that this one was so objectionable to the soldiers that the Senate gave it no consideration whatever, and hence it never became a law.

Not only this, but I made the broad declaration, which at that time I believed to be true, and which now I know to be true, that this committee never secured a single line of legislation during the last session of Congress. When I made that declaration, and when it went broadcast throughout the country, it was controverted by the chairman of that committee. My declaration in that regard was denied, and the only scintilla of proof that was ever produced here or elsewhere that my statement in that respect was untrue was the fact that this committee claimed to be the author of this now objectionable section, which was added as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill at the last session of Congress.

To disprove my statement the chairman and other members of that committee pointed with pride to that one solitary amendment to the pension appropriation bill in reference to the payment of the fees of pension attorneys or agents. It seemed then to have been the glory of that committee, and especially the glory of those who were thus representing it, that they had secured some legislation, and that a bill which came from that committee had ultimately become law. It was pointed to with pride by the chairman of that committee on this floor only a few days since, when he stated that the bill reported by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], a member of this committee, in regard to the fees of pension attorneys, had been ingrafted upon the pension appropriation bill passed at the last session and had become a part of the statutes of this country.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, this very law, which is now so strongly condemned, was placed to the credit of the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay only a few days since, when its chairman introduced in this House a resolution to expunge from the RECORD certain things that I had said about this committee; and it was then stated that this provision of law was carefully considered by this committee, reported to the House by one of its members, and attached as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill, and made the law of the land. This was the statement then made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] said on that occasion that this provision was reported by him from the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, under its direction, and that it subsequently passed the House and became a law. And it should be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that this statement was made for the purpose of showing that I had not stated the truth when I said that that committee had secured no legislation whatever. The statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will be found on page 229 of the RECORD of the proceedings of this House. He used this language; I will read it:

> The bill which I reported as a substitute, under the direction of the committee, for a provision in the pension appropriation bill, and which subsequently passed this House and became a law, was reported April 16, 1884, as will be found by reference to volume 66 of the RECORD, page 3011.

There he declares that this bill which he reported under the direction of his committee became a law. That was the sort of evidence then introduced to disprove the declaration which I had on other occasions made. The gentleman pointed with pride to the fact that this bill increasing the fee of pension attorneys from $10 to $25 came from his committee and ultimately became a part of the law of this land.

And on the same occasion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] said on the floor of this House, page 222 of the daily RECORD:

> Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, reported a bill, which will be found on page 3236 of the RECORD, relating to the fees of the claim agents, the substance of which bill was ingrafted on the pension appropriation bill, and is now a law.

And this was said for the same purpose, namely, to disprove my declaration that the committee of which the gentlemen from Ohio is chairman had secured no legislation whatever upon the statute-books of this country, although sixty-eight bills had been referred to it; for it will be remembered that I was making the point then that I make now, that that committee was the graveyard, has been the graveyard, and will continue to be the graveyard of all pension legislation in the Forty-eighth Congress. Yet the gentleman to disprove that declaration uses the language quoted.

Why this change of front? Only yesterday that was legislation which had come from the gentlemen's committee, and to which they pointed with great self-satisfaction. It was the only legislation to which they could possibly point, in seven long months, of which that committee claimed the paternity and authorship, and now all at once there is a change of front. I repeat, why this change? What is the occasion of this remarkable alteration of the sentiments of these gentlemen upon this floor and in the committee of this House? On one day claiming honor for what they professed to have done; on the next day ignoring the paternity of their own offspring and condemning it as a law corresponding with the piracy of the Middle Ages. They declare to-day that this committee never was the author of any such villainous legislation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It passed the House as the committee reported it.

Mr. KEIFER. And went into the bill as the committee reported it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Who put it in?

Mr. KEIFER. Your committee recommended it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I never denied, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] reported a bill. I never said that the bill was not a good one. I never raised that question; but I did him the honor and I did his committee the honor never to charge them with the authorship of this legislation. It never had occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay would claim the credit of this amendment to the appropriation bill, and consequently I made no allusion to it whatever. I simply stated the fact as I then believed it, and as I believe it now, more fully because of these explanations that no part of a bill from that committee ever became a part of the legislation of the country.

I only refer to this now because of my surprise and because of the surprise of other gentlemen on this floor that these gentlemen should attempt here before this House to arraign me for an alleged false statement, the entire truth of which they to-day frankly admit, since they are now engaged in exculpating themselves from the charge of authorship or paternity of this provision.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with them, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that this amendment was exceedingly unfortunate in some respects. It has enabled dishonest attorneys to rob soldiers of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. It was retroactive, and unscrupulous agents have gone abroad all over this land, wherever they found the cottage of the Union soldier, or of his widow, or of his orphans, and claimed an increase of their fee from $10 to $25 without reference to the character or condition of the claim. I appreciate the character of that amendment. I saw its operation day by day. And yet I never accused that committee of having been the author of it. I never held the committee responsible for the wrong contained in it. And yet it is nevertheless true that when you take away that authorship or paternity you have established most conclusively the truth of the position I have heretofore taken that the committee never did secure any legislation whatever.

And now, after what was witnessed on this floor yesterday, after the record which was made then in the consideration of the Mexican pension bill as it was amended by the Senate at the last session, after what now goes out before the country everywhere from ocean to ocean, coupled with what has occurred here to-day, I want gentlemen to remember—and I want them to carry it home with them—that every sentence, and every word, and every syllable of those remarks of mine printed on the four hundred and ninety-fourth page of the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, save and except the omission of two words, is entirely true; and it has been written down in the records of this country that those allegations stand unimpeached, because the last controverted proposition, the last disputed sentence, was surrendered yesterday and to-day. When I intended, on a former occasion, to say that that committee never reported but one bill for passage, the words "for passage" were omitted; and if this House had heard read, as it should have done, the other parts of those remarks, instead of voting in ignorance of what they contained, it would have understood what I then stated, that I was discussing what that committee was intending to do, what legislation it was intending to secure, and I repeat it now that that committee never reported but one bill for passage, and the facts and conduct of the committee warrant the conclusion that they never intended to pass any other bill involving general legislation or involving the principles of the Senate amendments to the Mexican pension bill.

I wish to say one more thing, Mr. Chairman; I regret the necessity of saying it. I take no pleasure in a discussion of this kind, but I felt that it was due to myself to make these statements, and to further say that all those allegations made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in regard to the time of my entering the service—the statement that I entered the service after the battle of Gettysburg, and after the battle of Vicksburg, and after the Mississippi was opened to the sea, &c.—were wholly untrue, as the Army records of the country, the records which are to-day in the War Department, will fully show.

Every paragraph, every sentence, every syllable of those allegations are entirely without a shadow of truth. But the gentleman made them with great declamation and then moved the previous question in order to prevent me from saying a word in reply. I submit whether such conduct as this should go unexplained and unchallenged.

Mr. Chairman, I had no thought of calling the attention of this House to-day or on any other day to this matter or to these statements. The circumstances of this hour and the surprising statements of these gentlemen have called them forth.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I hope the House will not do me the injustice of supposing I will undertake to-day to open a question discussed here on a former occasion, and which, I take it, in the judgment of this House is now res judicata. I allude to the question which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] has just been discussing. I did not take the floor, Mr. Chairman, with a view of responding to anything the gentleman from Ohio might suggest on this occasion. I had another object in view, which I will undertake to give the House the benefit of after I refer to a single remark which the gentleman from Ohio has just made, and I hope the gentleman will give me his attention, for I shall endeavor to set him an example which he could well follow in the future. I did state in the discussion which took place on the 13th of last month what the gentleman read from the RECORD. In other words, I said:

> The bill which I reported as a substitute, under the direction of the committee, for a provision in the pension appropriation bill, and which subsequently passed this House and became a law, was reported April 16, 1884, as will be found by reference to volume 66 of the RECORD, page 3011.

That part of my remarks, of which the gentleman from Ohio now complains, is the statement reported by me that this bill "became a law"—that, and that only. I did make that statement, and I made it under a misapprehension of fact. I now withdraw the statement, namely, "that bill became a law," and I commend the example I set to the gentleman from Ohio in the future.

This is all I have to say touching the controversy which grew out of the misconduct of the gentleman from Ohio after the adjournment of Congress at its last session. I thought, Mr. Speaker, when I made that remark that the bill which I had reported had become a law; and I now appeal to my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WHITING] who sits on the opposite side of the House, to state whether the discovery of this fact was not made by the committee at a session subsequent to the debate in which I made the statement.

Mr. WHITING made a gesture of assent.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Massachusetts answers in the affirmative. Until this discovery was made by our committee and since the debate to which I have referred no member of the House that I have heard except the gentleman from Texas—not even the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or any other member of that committee, so far as I have been able to learn—had discovered the fact that the bill which the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay reported, and which was accepted by the Committee on Appropriations, had not become a law.

I think, sir, that with this statement, supported as it is by my colleagues on the committee upon the other side of the House, I can well leave this branch of the subject where the House left it, and I do so. The gentleman from Ohio on this side [Mr. WARNER] can make any statement he may desire to submit after I am through.

Mr. Speaker, I now invite the attention of both sides of the House to a brief statement touching the business aspects of the proposition now pending. I will say in the beginning that when after the reassembling of the present Congress these abuses about which so much has been said were made known, I was struck with astonishment that the Commissioner of Pensions should have construed that statute, which we had matured in the committee, in such a way as to make the bill retroactive in its operation. In the progress of the debate upon the floor, gentlemen on both sides of the House, as I now recollect (and I have recently examined the RECORD), put the question to me, as the mover of that amendment upon the floor, whether or not it did operate retroactively, and I stated twice during the progress of the debate that it did not operate retroactively; that the intention was it should not so operate. I was therefore astounded when I ascertained the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions had placed that construction upon this measure, which I supposed was the bill I had reported and had become the law of the land.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I understood the recent colloquy between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Ohio, the construction of the Commissioner of Pensions on this subject was called in question by the gentleman from Iowa. I commend to his consideration, because I know from his conduct on this floor that he is the friend of the soldier, the fact that this bill which has become a law is substantially the same law which was passed in 1870, upon which the then Commissioner of Pensions placed the same interpretation that is now placed upon this act. No rule of construction is more potent or more seriously to be considered in determining the interpretation of a statute recently passed than the settled construction of a similar statute upon the same subject. The one, it is presumed, was passed in view of and with reference to the construction put upon the other. I say now to the gentleman, after a careful examination of this act, after a patient hearing of the Commissioner before our committee, after a thorough investigation of the subject myself at my rooms in the hope that I might be able to overturn the interpretation the Commissioner has placed on the act, I arrived at the conclusion, and so confessed to him, that his interpretation was correct. In view of the fact that this statute is substantially the same, so far as the provision under consideration is concerned, I have no doubt of it.

Mr. Chairman, the chief object I had in view in taking the floor was to invite attention to some amendments which I propose to offer to the bill now pending. I am somewhat loath to offer these amendments, because of the fact that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay has prepared an amendment which in the main seems acceptable to distinguished gentlemen on the floor. The amendment which I had proposed to offer—being in fact a bill every provision of which has been considered during the present session of Congress in our committee, although not authorized to be reported—is substantially the bill which this House passed at its last session, with the addition of several provisions, among others one looking to the annulment of those contracts which were filed between the passage of the act of 1878 and the act of 1884.

I have also added other provisions, the object of which is to prevent parties who have gone into this business of collecting claims for pensions, bounty, and back pay from doing as one firm in this city has done, transferring their business to a second firm in order that the latter might receive the benefits of the legislation which passed last session. So far as I am individually concerned, I have simply to say that I have not myself examined the record to ascertain who offered the substitute for the House bill in the Senate; but I have been informed that a distinguished soldier, whom in my boyhood I learned by practical experience to respect, offered the amendment. If he did, I now do him the credit to say that I believe when he offered it he was imposed upon as to the effect it would have upon the soldiers of this country.

But, sir, it makes no difference who prepared that Senate amendment. It was prepared carefully. Every feature of former legislation on the same subject had been scrutinized, and it was formed solely and exclusively in the interests of those men who make their living out of the soldier element of the country—the pension attorneys.

Mr. Chairman, I will avail myself of a statement made by the senior member of one of the most distinguished and honorable of the firms, engaged in this business in this city. When this bill was prepared last year he had been before the committee. He said to us in the committee that he believed it was as fair and as just as pension attorneys could require or demand. Yet, Mr. Chairman, during the present session of this Congress that gentleman tells me openly and frankly that when this bill which found its birth in the Senate, as I understand, perhaps in the conference committee, had become law, and he scrutinized it, he at once sent out circulars to thousands of clients all over the country asking them to enter into contracts increasing the fee $15 a case.

Sir, it is not my purpose here to attack these attorneys. I do not hold them responsible for this legislation. If the American Congress passes bills which find their origin in one end of the Capitol without mature consideration, or if it passes bills which have not been matured by any committee, I say it ought to be held responsible for the result. Its committees are intrusted with this legislation. Why, sir, the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay spent nearly two months of the last session of Congress trying to mature some measure which would meet with the approbation of the country and give pensions to those who are justly entitled to them; but somewhere this bill they proposed was stricken out and another inserted, and the flood-gates thrown open and the soldiers wronged.

Sir, the responsibility belongs to us. I have said so far as I am concerned I never knew or dreamed that this had become a law until the present session of Congress. I did not know that it had become the law in its present shape. It may be while charged in the last days of the last session of Congress with specific duties on a special committee which sat during the sessions of the House this report came from the conference committee and was passed when I was not present. However that may be, if I had known at the time the bill passed this carefully matured bill of our committee which I have said over and over again I believe closed the gates against all sort of tyranny, oppression, wrong, fraud, or injustice on the soldier element of the country, if the opportunity had been offered me I would have entered my protest against it passage.

I believe these measures ought to be matured in committee. Perhaps the amendment now offered by the chairman of the committee of which I happen to be a member may be a good one, and, so far as I am concerned, the only objection I can offer to it is that I have not had the opportunity to examine it at all. This amendment I offer I have examined, and the committee of which I am a member have examined it. Every feature of it has been carefully matured; and although one feature of his bill may be better than ours, I believe it would be the part of wisdom for the Committee on Appropriations to accept this amendment in lieu of the one my friend from Ohio proposes to offer on the subject.

Now, in reference to one legal feature of this proposition and I am through. One section of this amendment, all of which during my remarks I will ask the Clerk to read, looks to the annulment of all contracts which have been entered into by attorneys and clients where the application was filed after the act of 1878 and before the act of 1884. The law then fixed the fee at $10. If we strike down that provision of it we get rid of nearly all the abuses which have grown up under the passage of the law of the last session. But few applications have been filed since July, 1884.

The question arises, how can you consistently, having in view wise and conservative legislation, undertake to annul these contracts which have been made under the operation of a statute which, however bad, is certainly valid. Mr. Chairman, it can be made to rest in my opinion upon one single proposition, and that proposition is this: that in the law as it now exists there is a provision which made it the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to exercise his discretion as to whether or not he would allow the increased fee of $15 in each case. He did not exercise that discretion, but construed the law as allowing the additional $15 in all cases when contracts for $25 were filed. If we now enforce by statute what the Commissioner of Pensions might in his discretion do under existing law, I maintain that no contract will be violated in so doing. This position is re-enforced by the fact that the law, as it exists, operates retroactively and against the soldier; if it is not so in terms it is made so by construction; and I take it therefore that no injustice will be done the pension attorneys if we annul all contracts filed under the act of 1884, in cases filed between the passage of the act of 1878 and the act of 1884, thereby putting attorneys and clients on the same footing that they were when the attorneys undertook the cases.

The amendment which I propose to offer does not undertake to interfere with these contracts filed since July, 1884, which is the date of the passage of the bill in the last Congress. I say, Mr. Chairman, we ought not to interfere with those; that we ought to assume in the presence of the country whatever of responsibility belongs to that bad act. Bad though it be, whatever rights these men have under it they are entitled to justly.

Then there is another provision here, which I incidentally alluded to and to which I invite attention. It prohibits, under the penalties of this act imposed by the sixth section of it, any firm of lawyers from assigning their claim to others so that the assignee firm shall have the power to charge an additional fee for the prosecution of the claim; and it requires in that connection that the assignor firm, before the assignee firm can receive a single dollar when the claim is allowed, shall file an affidavit setting forth the exact sums that have been paid to them and which are entitled to be deducted from the original fee allowed by the law.

Now I believe I am through with the remarks I desired to make, and send to the desk to be read in my time the amendments which I propose to offer in conjunction with the original bill as it passed at the last session, the whole constituting the amendment to be offered now, reserving for the present the balance of my time until the reading is through.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant, and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases; and such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or presumptive claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive, and retain any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the House to the remainder of this amendment, it not being contained in the bill which passed the House at its last session—the portion just read having been offered as an amendment to that bill, and, as will be remembered, was adopted by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to my friend from Arkansas whether it would not be better to confine the amendment solely to the matter already read, that is, the exact language of the provision that passed through the House at the last session. Would it not be better that the bill should go to the Senate as it passed the House then, and as approved by the members of the committee and of the House?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can satisfy my friend from Indiana on that point in a moment. The bill, as it passed the House last session, did not allow an increase of attorneys' fees on claims filed between the act of 1878 and the act of 1884. But the bill that was substituted for the House bill did, under the construction placed upon it, extend the increase of fee over that period. The bill, as it passed last session, does not annul the contracts since made covering cases filed during that period. We have to go further and annul these contracts and conform the bill so as to meet the changed condition of things.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that understanding, it would be better, of course, that the amendment should go further.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask the Clerk to read the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, when such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10, nor shall said $10, or any part thereof, be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act; and if it shall appear from said affidavit or in any other way that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts entered into fairly and without fraud or duress for the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act; and that any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be upon conviction punished as provided in the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant, the prosecution of whose claims has been heretofore abandoned by his attorney, from employing another attorney or agent, but in no such case shall the fee paid such attorney exceed the sum of $10, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act: Provided, That if such new attorney successfully prosecute such claim the original attorney or agent shall not be allowed to demand or receive any part thereof under the penalties of the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 9. That hereafter no person or persons that may have been heretofore engaged in the prosecution of pension or bounty-land claims of any character whatsoever or who may have heretofore collected on account thereof any sum whatever shall be allowed to sell, assign, convey, or to make over to any other person any such claim or claims so as that it shall be lawful for any vendee or assignee of such claim or claims to demand or to receive any other or greater fee than is hereinbefore provided for, nor shall such vendee or assignee be allowed to receive anything therefor until the vendor or assignor of such claim or claims (if alive) shall make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in the fourth section of this act, and any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties imposed by the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 10. That the act approved July 4, 1884, and all other acts in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and that this act take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], the chairman of the committee, such time as he requires, reserving the balance of the time which he may not occupy.

Mr. MATSON. Before the gentleman from Arkansas takes his seat I wish to ask him whether the substantial difference between his proposition and that submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] lies in the fact that his does not attempt at all to annul the contracts filed between June, 1878, and July, 1884.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can not say precisely what are the distinctive features as between the two bills; but both seek to annul the contracts, so far as applications filed between 1878 and 1884 are concerned.

Mr. MATSON. Yours seeks to do that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And mine also does that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has twenty-nine minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire only to occupy the time of the committee for a few words in reply to what has been said as to the responsibility of the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay for this legislation. I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to shirk any responsibility which falls upon me as a member of this House in reference to this act or to any other. But I think it due to that committee to say that this bill after it had been reported to the House, and certainly after it had passed the House, was entirely beyond the control of that committee. It was ingrafted on the pension appropriation bill, a bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and the conference was between members of that committee and members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. No member of the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay was on that conference committee, and no member of that committee was any more responsible for the changes in the bill than my colleague from Ohio or any other member of this House.

My colleague from Ohio, who is a member of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. KEIFER], I do not think would be willing to assume the responsibility for the errors connected with this legislation. I certainly do not charge him with any such responsibility. The amendment adopted by the House was stricken out in the Senate. The House had no control of that, much less the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. The change was made, as I have already explained, in the conference committee. I have not looked to see, but I think I was not in the House. I certainly knew nothing of it. I think it was not read at all in the House; and I frankly admit I was not aware of any change until a few days before the adjournment of the House for the holiday recess. I ascertained that fact by calling upon the Commissioner of Pensions and asking how it was that the fee of $25 was allowed in cases filed prior to the passage of the act, and he called my attention to the law and I then saw that the law as it now stands on the statute-book was not the act as it passed the House. That was a fact I was not aware of when the discussion took place early in this session. I frankly admit it, but it has no bearing on that discussion. I do not think any member of this House had discovered the change. No one had spoken to me about it. So far as I know I made the discovery quite as early as anybody else.

The Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, as soon as the facts were discovered, took the matter in hand, called the Commissioner of Pensions before it, asked him for an explanation of the law, the interpretation he put upon it, what had been done under the law, the number of claims filed, &c., and that information is furnished to the House. Certainly it can not be charged that that committee has been derelict in its duty in this matter from the time the facts about the law were discovered.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to go back over questions that this House has already settled. I can not, however, let the occasion pass without a reference to the charge that is reiterated here by my colleague that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has neglected its duty, that it has acted in bad faith to this House. I do not think any other gentleman on this floor than my colleague would have made that charge. He charges my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WHITING] as well as myself and all other members of the committee, my friend from New York [Mr. BREWER] and my friend from New York [Mr. GREENLEAF], and other members of that committee with acting in bad faith, as members of that committee in what they have done and reported to this House; that in the measures they have considered and reported they have been trifling with the House, not acting in good faith, not meaning what they have said and done.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a gentleman must be devoid of a sense of the honor of gentlemen and the responsibility of members of this House to make such a charge, a charge affecting members who, I think this House will agree, are actuated by motives as high and honorable certainly as those which actuate him; gentlemen having as high a sense of honor and of the responsibility that pertains to them as members of this House as he can have.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not refer to what was said here on another occasion; but I deny the charge which is reiterated now that the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay has not acted in as good faith as any other committee of this House; that it has not labored as faithfully in considering all measures that have been referred to it. Not a single bill has been referred to that committee which has not had consideration. Its chairman has referred all bills to subcommittees. They have been considered, and bills have been reported to this House and are on its Calendar expressing the judgment of that committee as to the legislation which this House ought at this time to adopt. When a committee has reported measures to the House those measures are in the control of the House.

But our committee went further and instructed the gentlemen who reported those several measures to take the first opportunity to call them up and press them to a passage. The bill which I had the honor myself to report was passed under a suspension of the rules. My colleague, in his speech printed after the adjournment of Congress, complained that we passed the bill under a suspension of the rules, and now complains that we do not pass more that way. We thought the only sure way to get that bill through at that session was to pass it under a suspension of the rules, and we deemed it important that it should be passed early. The other bills are here. The House can judge of their merits; and when they come up they will doubtless be acted upon as in the judgment of the House may be deemed best.

But when the gentleman charges members of that committee with acting in bad faith and not intending the passage of the measures they have reported he makes a charge without any authority or warrant whatever. What does he know of the action of that committee? What does he know as to what has been done in that committee or by members of the committee? Let me call his attention and the attention of the House to this fact: this committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, a Republican Congress, was called together, I believe, but once during both sessions. No bills were considered; not one bill was reported from it, if I am rightly informed. That Republican committee of that Republican House did not consider or report a single bill, as I am informed. If I am in error I hope I may be corrected. Certainly not one bill coming from that committee was acted on; and the records, as I am told, show that the committee was only called together once during both sessions of the Forty-seventh Congress.

But the committee of the present Congress is arraigned for a political purpose and charged with dereliction of duty, although it has held regular sessions twice a week nearly all the time, considering bills which were referred to it. And I will state now what I have not stated before, and what I did not intend to speak of, that under the instructions of the committee its chairman has been at work upon a report on pension legislation, going back to the earliest legislation upon the subject of pensions, beginning with the Continental Congress—a report designed to embrace a digest of all the discussions and legislation of Congress on the subject of pensions. This work, which must of course be somewhat voluminous, has not yet been completed. I hope to have time to complete it before the close of this session. I shall endeavor to do so, but may not be able. In that report it is proposed to show succinctly what has been the policy of our Government on this question, what distinguished men have said on pension measures in Revolutionary times or relating to Revolutionary pensions, as well as relating to pensions of the war of 1812, and later legislation of the same class.

He who thinks that the work which has come before our committee is light and ought to be turned off in a week or two has but a limited understanding of the scope and meaning of pension legislation. It must be remembered that pension legislation, involving the interests of thousands and hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and the expenditure of hundreds, yes, thousands, of millions of dollars, is a far-reaching subject. I have said many times that I thought it a greater and more important subject than the national debt. Very few questions before Congress are more important surely than questions relating to pensions. The pension laws as they stand are much involved. They have been made up by a sort of patch-work process. I have favored a commission to digest and reconstruct our entire pension legislation; but such a work can not be done during a session of Congress. I think it ought to be done. I do not believe we shall have a wise and consistent pension system until there has been a complete revision of the pension laws. But to suppose that our committee, with all its other duties, can do all this work in a single session is ridiculous.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to be a member of another committee before which some 1,200 bills are pending, nearly one hundred of which have been placed in my hands for examination and report. Some of them involve millions of dollars. I finished the other day and am prepared to submit a report on one case involving $20,000,000. Is it expected that members can take up all the various questions presented in hundreds of bills, make lengthy reports upon them, and do justice in all cases to the subjects committed to them? All that it has been possible for members of my committee and for myself to do I believe we have done. I know we have endeavored to do so. We have sought to discharge our duties honestly and in good faith as members of this House. The charge made by my colleague is one which I ought to ask pardon of the House for making reference to at all. Such charges and such insinuations only merit the contempt of myself, as I believe they do of every other member of this House.

Mr. GOFF. It seems, Mr. Chairman, the explanations made by the chairmen of committees and also by individual members of the House have but little in fact to do with the matter now presented for our consideration. I think if the gentlemen who have even discussed this matter will examine the statute critically they will ascertain they have created a tempest in a tea-pot, and that there is in fact very little wrong which has been accomplished by the legislation of 1884. It has enabled these gentlemen to make their personal explanations and to endeavor indirectly or to shift responsibility from one committee to another, but we all know that our committees, like the king, can do no wrong.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But my friend would not do me a wrong there or my committee.

Mr. GOFF. Certainly not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will he then explain how the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay could control the action of a conference between the two Houses?

Mr. GOFF. I am not laying the responsibility on the gentleman's committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Thank you.

Mr. GOFF. I do not lay it on the Committee on Appropriations or that committee which has a subject of conference between the two Houses; nor do I think it proper to lay it on the other end of the Capitol either. We should assume our responsibility, and our Committee on Appropriations and the members who represented us in conference should bear their part of it if there be any to bear.

I say, Mr. Chairman, there has been little wrong if any by any committee, and I think the gentleman from Ohio when he offered his amendment and submitted his speech to the House said things which the facts will not bear out. The act of 1884, so far as it affects the rights of parties under contracts entered into previous to 1884, is not retroactive. There is no lawyer on this floor who will say so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman will not deny that under the interpretation given by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions——

Mr. GOFF. I say that is not the interpretation given by either the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow me to say a word?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. In conversation with the Commissioner of Pensions within the last forty-eight hours he said to me that was his interpretation, and that he felt himself compelled under the act to approve every single contract that had been filed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the Commissioner of Pensions said the same thing before our committee.

Mr. GOFF. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have not reached that question. That is a question of contract which takes place subsequent to the passage of the act of 1884, and in which the claimant and agent reached a conclusion. I say under the act itself the claimant can present this claim and make this demand. This House can not say to the citizens of the country, "You shall not enter into this contract."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not claimed that. Nobody has claimed it.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman from Ohio has claimed the effect of the act of 1884 is to make the fee of $25 applicable to all contracts entered into by virtue of the act of 1870, I believe it is. Now, such is not the case. I will concede to the gentleman some claim agents have made claimants for pensions believe that was the effect of the act, and I concede also certain parties have entered into contracts under the stipulations of this act by which they agree to pay $25 for that they were entitled to have done by the payment of $10. But that is not the effect and operation of this act; and I think if the gentleman from Missouri will read the act he will so understand it, and he must have misunderstood the gentleman he alluded to a moment ago as referring to the effect of a contract entered into between an agent and attorney subsequent to the passage of the act.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I held the same view of the law which the gentleman has stated before having the conversation referred to with the Commissioner of Pensions. He told me, however, that was the law, and that where contracts had been filed between claim agents and claimants in cases which had arisen and been completed as far as filing evidence was concerned under contract to charge only $10, he felt compelled under that act to approve a new contract, giving the claim agent $15 additional, or in all a fee of $25 for each case. That in my judgment is the greatest outrage ever perpetrated.

Mr. GOFF. I say so. We do not differ on that point. That is the contract, I say, that has been subsequently entered into between the attorney and the claimant. It is a voluntary contract. It is not the action of the Commissioner of Pensions which would be taken by virtue of this act, but for the contract subsequently made. That is what I mean. There is no bearing whatever in the case the gentleman from Missouri cites and the point the gentleman from Ohio makes in his argument. It is not owing to this language in this act of 1884 that this action on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions is taken, but it is owing to the fact that the claimant and the attorney have entered into a contract subsequently.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Which contract could not have been entered into but for the passage of that act.

Mr. GOFF. Which could not have been done——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If the gentleman from West Virginia will allow me, I want to relieve the Commissioner of Pensions from the responsibility of approving a contract which in his judgment is a fraud upon the face of it.

Mr. GOFF. I am with the gentleman in that respect. I am going to do that, too, if I can; but I want to say to this House that there has not been the great blunder or error which the gentlemen who represent the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and also the Appropriations Committee, think has been made.

Now, what action might have been taken subsequently to that time is another thing, and some legislation may be necessary to prevent its continuance in the future. But it is no new thing to provide that a fee of $25 shall be allowed for prosecuting claims. It is not the first time in the history of this country that such a fee has been allowed. It was at the request of the soldiers themselves in the first instance.

It was allowed at the request of the claimants for pensions who had been demanding of the Government that owed them the pension—and I use the word "owed" to the gentleman from Ohio—that they should receive what they were entitled to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I assent to that in every case where there was a disability incurred in the military service.

Mr. GOFF. Well, we are not going to get off the track now, I hope.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I trust not.

Mr. GOFF. Then I say this change was made originally at the request of the soldiers, and the same bugaboo which the gentleman now complains of did not seem to frighten them.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not want to be understood as assenting to that part of the gentleman's remarks, however, that this was done at the request of the soldiers themselves. That I do not admit.

Mr. GOFF. Very well; we will see how it was. It was claimed that advantage had been taken of that act. I have no doubt of it. Sharp, shrewd, brainy men from the time that time was down to the present have imposed upon those not so fortunate as themselves, and they will continue so to do as long as time is, and no legislation of ours can prevent it.

But this legislation was subsequently changed, and it was provided that a pension fee could not be contracted for to exceed the sum of $10, and that remained in force down to the passage of the act of 1884. What was the reason of that change? I do not know who the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole at the present time, alluded to a moment ago when he spoke of the distinguished soldier to whom he was referring, but I do mean to say that the distinguished soldier was not far wrong when he said that the interests of the soldiers of this country demanded that they might have the privilege, not that they should be charged, but that they might have the privilege of contracting to pay $25 for the prosecution of their claims. Why, it is not written in this act, it is not nominated in this bond, that these soldiers shall be compelled to pay a fee of $25; and in the absence of the contract—and I speak of the act of 1884—the absence of the contract to pay fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five dollars, which it shall not exceed, the sum of $10 is still paid for that service.

Now, there are cases which no attorney will undertake, I care not whether he lives in the city of Washington or in a county of any one of the different States of the Union where the claimant lives. There are some cases that can not be and will not be undertaken for the sum of $10. It will not be possible for a man to prosecute them for such a sum. If, then, you prohibit the soldier from contracting to exceed the sum of $10, and if you make it a penalty, ay, a felony, for the attorney to charge over the $10, or enter into a contract by virtue of which he will receive over $10, you simply say to the soldiers of that class, "You shall not be allowed to prosecute your claims."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow a question?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir; a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman understands that another amendment proposed cuts off that right in claims after the passage of the act?

Mr. GOFF. I have not reached your amendment yet. I am only discussing the law you are abusing here; that is all; and I will not take any longer the time of the committee on that point.

Now, the gentleman takes exceptions to this provision and he relies upon it more particularly. He claims that since the passage of the act of 1884 the clerical force of the Pension Department, to a great extent, has been occupied in ascertaining to whom this fee of $10 in old long-since adjudicated cases shall be paid. Does the gentleman mean to say that that is new legislation? I would like to know whether the gentleman from Ohio claims that that is new legislation. He has hurled the thunderbolts of his eloquence more particularly at that. Now, is that new legislation? If the gentleman does not intend to answer——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If my friend will allow me, I wish to say I was trying to catch the full force of his question; my attention was otherwise occupied at the moment he commenced to address the question to me.

Mr. GOFF. This is one of the counts of the gentleman's indictment against this legislation, that it provided that the force in the Pension Office should ascertain to whom of the great number of claim agents throughout the country this fee of $10 should be paid, and that the Department should cause it to be paid.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is what the Pension Office is now doing in those cases where the fee of $10 has not been paid—that is, where the last attorney claims that it has not been paid. The clerical force—a part of it, the necessary part of it—of the Pension Office is turned on to those cases and is looking them up, and the Office has already adjudicated and paid some 20,000 of them $10 each, making $200,000.

Mr. GOFF. It has been the law of this country ever since 1868 that attorneys should have their claims adjudicated at the Department, and that it should be the duty of the Pension Commissioner to transmit that adjudication, together with the certificate of the allowance of the pension, to the pension agents of the country, who were to deduct that fee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg pardon of the gentleman from West Virginia. He is mistaken as to the act of June, 1878. Prior to that the law was as he states; but it was not the law from 1878 to 1884.

Mr. GOFF. I say it is not new legislation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But in this case Government clerks are set at work going back over these cases after men have been allowed their pensions, and when they have paid perhaps other attorneys, and the Government is required to collect these now stale claims and pay the amounts over to the agents. That is new legislation, and novel legislation, too.

Mr. GOFF. I claim it is not new legislation, and that is not the effect of the legislation. It is true it is made the duty of the Commissioner, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10 has not been paid. Now, if that fee of $10 has been paid to the claim agent, it is utterly impossible unless fraud is resorted to for the subsequent claim agent to have the fee paid to him again.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The practice of the Pension Office is this: If a claimant has paid a fee to somebody under the act of June, 1878, some agent—to the Fitzgeralds, for instance, who sold out to the Lemons afterward—and now the new claim agent comes in, not as the agent of the former attorney, and the fee is paid to him, although the soldier may have paid under a former contract half a dozen fees——

Mr. GOFF. I do not know what the practice may have been, but I say that can not be done under the statute. That is what I say and that is what I have been endeavoring to show, that you have been making statements here as to matters which have been done, as to contracts that have been entered into, as to outrages said to have been perpetrated, which, if they have occurred, find no warrant under the statute. That is what I mean. The Commissioner may be imposed upon, the Secretary may be imposed upon, you or I may be imposed upon. Fraud may have been committed. But that is not the effect of the operation of the statute. I insist that its plain construction does not warrant those things, and that the most critical attorney could not find in it a warrant for such things.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to again interrupt him, although I do not desire to intrude on his time? If a former claim agent or attorney has been paid by the claimant under the act of June 20, 1878, which allowed the collection of fees prior to the allowance of the claim and without regard to the allowance of the claim, and another claim agent has been appointed, the former one having abandoned the claim, he comes de novo into the claim, and the Commissioner of Pensions can not do otherwise under the law than in pay him the fee.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman is mistaken. I read the statute:

In all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension, and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney.

Now, if the fee has been paid to the attorney then prosecuting the case, or if any part of it has been paid to the attorney presenting the claim, then the Commissioner has to so ascertain from the facts submitted to him and to declare the result as any other judge would do. As to this subsequent claim to which the gentleman from Ohio alludes, the attorney may have imposed on the Commissioner; but that is not the fault of the law; nor from what I know of the Commissioner is he apt to be imposed upon in that regard.

I am not defending any agent or agents. I am endeavoring to defend the soldiers of this country, those that I think are entitled to the serious consideration of this Congress; and it is not to their interest, Mr. Chairman, that we should have these continuous changes in the pension laws of the land or in the legislation under which pensions are to be secured.

Nor do we subserve the interest of the soldiers by saying to attorneys who have become proficient in this line of business, who have made it their study for a quarter of a century, that they shall step down and out; that new men shall come in to prosecute these claims. The soldiers of this country, in their misery and penury, must contribute to the fund by which new men shall be educated to prosecute their causes.

It is utterly wrong to arraign an entire class in this manner. There are honorable and conscientious gentlemen engaged in the prosecution of these claims, and there are also bad men, men who defraud the soldiers of the country, and it is our duty to prevent the latter class from being successful. There are black sheep in all professions and in all communities, if not in all parliamentary bodies.

The proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, wherein it is provided that an attorney residing in the city of Washington shall not prosecute one of these stale cases at a fee exceeding $10, is not in the interest of the soldiers of the country; on the contrary, it is a direct stab at their interest. It says to them that they shall not be permitted now, in their old age and in their want, to make contracts which will enable them speedily to obtain the pittance which the Government doles out to them.

The provision which proposes to permit a contract for $25 in the county where the party resides is not in the soldiers' interest. Why, Mr. Chairman, go to your own home; what reputable attorney there will undertake, for this fee of $25, a case which, bear in mind, is a peculiar case? The easy cases, the good cases, the cases rapidly and easily proven, have been adjudicated. It is the stale cases, the cases which demand strict attention, the cases where witnesses have gone to their long homes, where records have been destroyed, where claimants are not able to produce living witnesses to speak for them—it is cases of this kind that demand the payment of $25 fees. What attorney at the home of the claimant can undertake for such a fee a case of this kind, which may require him to visit the capital of the country and inspect the records of the nation before the case can be determined? Therefore, I say, that while by this provision you intend to benefit the soldiers of the country you do not do it; you in fact prohibit them from making a contract to secure the pensions to which they are entitled.

Another thing, the gentleman's amendment repeals all laws imposing penalties for offenses under our previous legislation on this subject. All men who are now arraigned in the courts of this country for fraudulent practices on the soldiers of this country, all men who are to-day under indictment for such offenses will by the operation of this amendment repealing the penalties for such offenses walk out of the courthouses of the country acquitted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My amendment only repeals provisions of law in conflict with the proposed amendment; it repeals no law not in conflict with it.

Mr. GOFF. Yes, it does.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GOFF. It repeals such provisions as "relate to the fees of agents or attorneys, and all other acts or parts of acts."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It repeals so much of the act of July 4, 1884, as relates to fees of agents and attorneys; that is all.

Mr. GOFF (reading):

And all other acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Exactly. It repeals everything in conflict with it, but it repeals nothing else.

Mr. GOFF. I will show my friend that I am right. This act of July 4, 1884, enbraces a penalty for the violation of the section relating to the collection of pensions. The previous acts passed by Congress imposed penalties for like violations.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

Mr. GOFF. Allow me to get through. Under these acts prosecutions have been commenced, indictments have been found, and those are the very acts that the gentleman's amendment would repeal.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But they were repealed by the act of July 4, 1884.

Mr. GOFF. Oh, no; they were not; you can not find any such legislation as that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman will find it right in the act itself.

Mr. GOFF. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If my amendment is not perfect in its terms it can be amended; and any amendment which the gentleman from West Virginia may offer which will improve my amendment I shall be glad to accept.

Mr. GOFF. I should have no difficulty at all in suggesting an amendment which would cover that branch of the case. But I do think that the proposition which the gentleman has embodied in this amendment by which he would restrict to these stale cases—I borrow this adjective from the gentleman himself—the right of the claimant to contract for the payment of a fee of $25 is unwise and will be injurious in its effects. This twenty-five-dollar clause was restored, upon the petition of the soldier organizations throughout the country, owing to the extraordinary quantity of work which the attorney is often compelled to undertake in order to secure favorable action for his client.

Now, I insist that we had better go slowly in this matter; and while I do not mean to assert that any gentleman on this floor does not endeavor honestly to subserve the interests of the soldiers of the country, I do claim that legislation of the kind here proposed is directly against the interest of the men whom I assume gentlemen here desire to protect.

Mr. HANCOCK rose.

Mr. KEIFER. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas I would like to be heard.

Mr. HANCOCK. Certainly. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to hold the floor under any limitation, but I will not occupy it to exceed five or ten minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield the floor to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Ohio, for whatever time he desires.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to follow up the line of discussion we have drifted into here to-day. I commend, of course, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], the present chairman of this committee, in withdrawing the statement which he made some time ago in the discussion of a resolution which affected very seriously my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR]; I say I commend that as an example to my other colleague [Mr. WARNER]. We ought to sympathize with my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] when we know this House is not now in condition to rescind its vote on that resolution some time ago, which was given largely on account of these statements which are now withdrawn.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose.

[Cries of "Order!" on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. KEIFER. I can not yield to my colleague after having interrupted for two-thirds of the time of almost every member who has spoken on this subject. I hope he will allow me to finish a sentence before interrupting me. I will be courteous to him.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not attribute it to the gentleman's discourtesy, but to his indisposition to wait. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman. I would like to ask him a question. [Laughter.] I regret I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. KEIFER. I only said this much, that in order it may be understood that the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], was condemned in part by a vote of this House the principal part of which was effected by statements which are now withdrawn——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not in the slightest degree. It had no effect on that at all.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will get my consent before he takes the floor from me—I mean the gentleman who is now running away. [Laughter.] He has spoken over an hour to vindicate his course while on committees.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I now return. [Laughter.] There is a mistake about that; no one charged him with it anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is entitled to the floor, and it cannot be taken from him without his consent. He will therefore proceed.

Mr. KEIFER. I am obliged to the Chair, as I have not yet been allowed so far to proceed without interruption. I will say that after the gentlemen from Ohio on the other side [Mr. WARNER] has occupied at least two hours to-day in vindicating his own conduct and his own industry while on committees of the House, he really ought to permit me to proceed for the few minutes which I intend to occupy the floor without interruption.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not occupied as much time as my colleague did last term himself. If my colleague will vindicate himself I must be allowed to vindicate myself. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. KEIFER. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that a great deal of forbearance ought to be extended by the Chair to the gentleman from Ohio, because it is constitutional with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, rose. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want him to prove my assertion any more than he can help. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will spare the gentleman any further——

Mr. KEIFER. I was about to say that the great difficulty lies in the fact that this House has been acting in this Congress as well as in previous Congresses under rules which were adopted to prevent action in the House rather than to favor it. I have been one of those ever since I came here and occupied a seat upon this floor who believed that the majority of this House ought to be able to take up any measure whenever it chose to do so. If that were done, in my judgment legislation would proceed with decorum and be settled with consistency and dispatch. Now, if that fact had been stated by the gentleman who is so fearful that he will not be known as a faithful and industrious man here it would have been a sufficient answer to any remark my other colleague could have made.

I believe the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, the Committee on Claims, and many other committees who have reported hundreds and thousands of bills now on our calendars which never can be reached, are entitled to credit for working out a work that is never to bear fruit, and which they must know can not bear fruit in this House. It is a good deal of a task to ask a man to sit down and consider a long claim, or the provisions of a bill, with a full knowledge that when he has worked out something satisfactory to himself or good to the whole country, that when it comes in here with a report covering all of the points in the case it must go to the burying-ground of all such matters, to wit, the House Calendar or the Committee of the Whole.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to the measure under consideration, as I have been forced to depart a little from what I had intended to say. I wanted to suggest in general debate on the subjects embraced in this bill a few points bearing directly upon it. I think with the present occupant of the chair that with some little additions or modifications to adjust it to the present day the bill which passed the House on the 22d day of April last was a wise bill on the subject of the payment of claim agents, provided we are going to tolerate any longer the present system at all. I entered my protest in the last session of Congress against this whole plan of claim agents. It has proved to be bad from the beginning. The whole system of preparing pension cases and sending them to the Pension Office is faulty. It is a bad system, and growing worse.

No lawyer, as I once said before in this House, of good standing in his own county or village will take one of these claims. Why? Simply because he can not afford to enter upon that sort of practice. The better lawyers, or those who rank among the younger and the rising men coming up throughout the country, never think of taking a claim of this kind. The claims, as a rule, which are presented in the Department are not prepared in a lawyer-like way. The statement is bad, and when presented it has the appearance of having been prepared by persons who do not understand the effect of evidence or what is competent evidence in the case, and this, I may say, is the rule in such cases. Every day the members of this House get hundreds of letters from all parts of the country with reference to pension cases, and one of our duties, and a heavy duty here, is in the writing of letters about pension cases. We all know upon examination of such cases on file in the Departments that it would be a shame or a disgrace to any lawyer of standing to have prepared the statements and claims as we find them.

We ought to provide in some way that these claimants for pensions should be allowed to employ men who know something of the law. The claim should be presented not only in the proper form of application, but the law and the testimony should be arranged in proper shape by men who know the effect of the law, and then sent to the Department to be considered and decided as any other case.

It would be to the interest of the Government to do this, and I undertake to say that there is more that one-half of all the clerks in the Pension Office now engaged in working upon claims or answering letters from ourselves and others about claims that are never to be allowed in the world, and which were never expected in many cases to be allowed when the applications were filed. How does the system work? A man or woman goes to a person who knows nothing whatever about the case, and cares less, and asks him to make an application for a pension. The application is made out in some shape and perhaps the applicant is told by the party who makes up the application that he will probably succeed in getting the pension. After awhile he is informed that the application is in, and then correspondence begins and the Department designates what proof is required. The applicant is notified and then goes around the country to try and find it.

The claim agent says to the claimant, perhaps some poor widow or broken-down soldier suffering from disease or wounds incident to the service, "You must furnish such and such testimony," and they are sent prowling around the country to find it. Years elapse and nothing is done. Within a week I have had inquiry with reference to a claim which was filed thirteen years ago. Letters are sent asking us every day what is necessary to do to get a claim long pending. So after a while the time comes when the claimant is asked to pay some money to the claim agent to cover expenses already incurred; and in point of fact the agent is not so much to blame. He is asked at times to go to a distant county or State perhaps to see if he can find witnesses or hunt up evidence or induce a witness to come before a proper officer and furnish the affidavit required by the office. How can he go? Must he go at his own expense? If he goes he must lose time; he must pay his expenses of traveling, his hotel bills, and yet all of this is expected to be undertaken for the paltry sum of $10. He can not be employed in the ordinary course of business as any attorney in any other case is employed.

Within a month a gentleman in my town, broken down in health and every other way, whether incident to the service or not is immaterial, has been notified to go one hundred and fifty miles to attend a special examination. He can not go himself. It is impossible for him to do so. He can not leave his own door. The claim agent is asked to go, and has to travel the one hundred and fifty miles. He goes and stays four or five days watching the case. Is it right to say that this man shall be paid but $10, and if he exceeds that sum that he shall be sent to the penitentiary; or is the solider obliged to abandon his case, his just claim, altogether, and surrender it because of the policy of legislation on the part of Congress?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I desire just one moment more on another point.

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield to the gentleman a few minutes more.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Texas yields to me that I may say a word in reference to another part of this bill that has not yet been spoken of—the reduction of the number of pension agents from eighteen to twelve. I do not believe that is wise in an economical point of view. I do not believe it is wise in view of the prompt payment of pensions. And I am authorized to say, because I have before me a letter written to the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations by the Commissioner of Pensions, that the Commissioner does not think it will be economical legislation to reduce the number certainly below sixteen. This bill proposes to reduce the number to twelve. I think it would be wise to allow the number of pension agents to stand where it is now.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not feel I am arraigned here or on trial, or that it is necessary for me to offer any vindication of the participation I may have had in the conference between the House and the Senate on this bill in the last session. The measure complained of was brought forward and championed by a very distinguished soldier Senator who has been as conspicuous and probably as effective in his advocacy of the rights of the soldier as any man in this broad land. He strongly urged the provisions which are now so much objected to, and he impressed me with the conviction that they were such as were best calculated to secure the highest interests of the pensioner.

Simmered down to the actual point of complaint, it may be stated that the soldier has his liberty so far enlarged that he may make a contract to the extent of paying $25 for securing his pension claim. That is all there is in it so far as I can see, and all that has been presented on the part of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. It seems that he and his colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], like old soldiers, delight to shoulder their crutch and show how battles were won and lost on the field in the last canvass.

It appears the law has been so interpreted that these agents were permitted to make additional charges for claims that probably had been long pending, and upon which $10 had been paid, and that now they have got an addition of $10. Whether that has been beneficial to the soldier or not I do not know. But I think it very likely it has been.

It was stated in the committee of conference, as I well recollect and I know my colleague on the committee will sustain me in that recollection, that it was frequently worth $100 to make up a claim, and that unless the soldier was permitted to make such a contract he would likely never have got anything. It was represented there was one instance where it would have required several weeks to go through all the different accounts in the disbursing offices in order to secure the information which was required by the Commissioner of Pensions before he could finally act upon the application.

I believe most of the soldiers are competent to act for themselves, and I think it would be in the line of their interests to let them do so under the supervision of the Commissioner of Pensions. This law left it under his supervision; and if he did not scrutinize the matter as closely as he might have done, I have no doubt an excuse is to be found in his having been heavily burdened at the time with political duties. He wished to be where the canvass waxed warmest and he was constrained to go where my friends had their encounter of which we have heard so much to-day, and he had not time to look at this thing.

I make these remarks rather in vindication of my colleagues on the committee of conference than of myself, for I do not feel I need any. A good deal of this pension matter is a grab game, and if lawyers get $25 out of it I do not think it is more than they are entitled to. The average is $8.33; not a very big thing. I have nothing more to say about that. I think, Mr. Chairman, this debate has occupied a sufficient time, and I move that the committee rise for the purpose of asking the House to limit the debate to thirty minutes. I will make that motion unless the committee will agree to proceed now to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the pension appropriation bill; and pending this motion I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to one minute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HANCOCK, that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it was agreed to; and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate is limited to one minute.

Mr. HANCOCK. I waive my right to occupy one minute in debate, and ask that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, $500,000. And hereafter each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day: Provided, That if twenty or more applicants appear on one day, no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, twenty or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until twenty examinations shall have been made.

Mr. EVERHART. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph just read add:

"Provided, That all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment; but such presumption may be rebutted."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 53, noes 44.

Mr. BLAND and others. "No quorum."

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HANCOCK and Mr. EVERHART were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 14.

So the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the salaries of twelve agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $48,000; and from and after July 1, 1885, there shall be no more than twelve agents for the payment of pensions, and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HEPBURN. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 30 by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting "eighteen;" amend line 31 by striking out "forty-eight" and inserting "seventy-two;" amend line 32 by striking out all after the word "dollars;" and strike out lines 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, and 39; so that, as proposed to be amended, the paragraph will read:

"For the salaries of eighteen agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $72,000."

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman who offers this amendment does not intend to go quite so far as the amendment by its terms proposes. It seems to me the clause contained in lines 37, 38, and 39, which this amendment proposes to strike out, ought to remain, because that has relation to the preceding provision fixing the salary of these officers. I cordially concur in the amendment provided the gentleman in his proposition to strike out will stop at line 36.

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me that is not necessary. The salary is already fixed in line 31.

Mr. KEIFER. But sections 4778 and 4780 of the Revised Statutes should be modified so as to be in harmony with this legislation. That is the reason the last clause of the paragraph should be allowed to remain.

Mr. GOFF. Section 4778 provides simply that the President shall appoint pension agents; and section 4780 provides that he shall distribute them over the country at such points as he may deem proper. There is nothing in those sections on the subject of salaries.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I was under a misapprehension.

Mr. GOFF. If the concluding clause of the paragraph be struck out the President may still act under those sections and make these designations.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 48, noes 76.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the sections which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions, out of the first installment of pension due the claimant; and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 20, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service, and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases. And such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or prospective claimant, by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney, or other person, instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or arrears thereof, who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, or receive, and retain, any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension or arrears thereof greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

SEC 7. That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10; nor shall said $10 or any part thereof be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act. And if it shall appear from said affidavit or in any other way that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts entered into fairly and without fraud or duress for the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act; and that any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be, upon conviction, punished as provided in the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant, the prosecution of whose claim has been heretofore abandoned by his attorney, from employing another attorney or agent, but in no such case shall the fee paid such attorney exceed the sum of $10, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act: Provided, That if such new attorney successfully prosecute such claim, the original attorney or agent shall not be allowed to demand or receive any part thereof, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 9. That hereafter no person or persons who may have been heretofore engaged in the prosecution of pension or bounty-land claims of any character whatsoever, and who may have heretofore collected on account thereof any sum whatever, shall be allowed to sell, assign, convey, or make over to any other person any such claim or claims so as that it shall be lawful for any vendee or assignee of such claim or claims to demand or receive any other or greater fee than is hereinbefore provided for; nor shall such vendee or assignee be allowed to receive anything therefor, unless the vendor or assignor of such claim or claims, if alive, shall make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in the fourth section of this act. And any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties imposed by the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 10. That the act approved July 4, 1884, and all other acts in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that this act take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What has become of the amendment I offered to come in at the end of the bill?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman did not offer it, but only read it as a part of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman did not offer his amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did state that I sent up to the Clerk's desk to be read an amendment which I proposed to offer to come in at the end of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but when the end of the bill was reached the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] offered his amendment, which is now pending.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer my amendment, then, as a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. No agent or attorney, or other person, shall demand or receive a greater fee than $10 for services rendered in behalf of any claimant for pension or bounty land under any law of the United States; and it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney, or other person, to demand or receive any part of such fee until the claim for pension or bounty land shall have been allowed, and, in case of pensions, such fee shall be paid to the attorney of record out of the first installment due the claimant by the agent paying the pension, and in no other way: Provided, That in claims for pensions filed after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any agent or attorney, being a bona fide resident of the same State and county with the claimant, to contract in writing, in form to be approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, for a fee not exceeding $25, no part of which fee shall be demanded or received until the claim shall have been allowed, and then shall be paid only by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment due the pensioner, and it shall be unlawful for such agent, attorney, or other person, directly or indirectly, to enter into partnership for the purpose of dividing said fee of $25 or in any manner to divide said fee with any agent or attorney or other person residing in any other county or State or in the District of Columbia, and any person found guilty of violating this provision shall, in addition to the penalty prescribed by this act, forfeit all right to such fee.

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall apply to and include all cases filed in the Pension Office between June 20, 1878, and July 4, 1884, whether contracts have been filed in the same or not, and which remain unsettled, and to all cases filed after the passage of this act; and in all cases where any part of the fee of $10 has been paid by the claimant to any agent or attorney of record in the case, the same shall be deducted from the fee of $10 allowed by this act; and if any agent or attorney shall neglect or abandon any claim intrusted to him it shall be lawful for the claimant to employ another agent or attorney, and the agent or attorney who prosecutes the claim to final settlement shall be entitled to the fee.

SEC. 3. Any agent or attorney, or other person, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive, or retain any other or greater compensation for his services in behalf of a claimant for pension or bounty land than is herein provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That so much of the act approved July 4, 1884, as relates to the fees of agents or attorneys, and all other acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect on its passage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The House will observe that the principal difference between the amendments I have offered and the amendments offered by my colleague on the committee, which embraces the whole of the act passed at the last session, is in making a difference of fee to agents residing in the District of Columbia and those residing in the States where the claimants reside. I think that is an important feature.

I wish to call the attention of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to a statement which he made in reference to this amendment, claiming that it repealed the penalties of former statutes. Let me read to him section 13, chapter 2, of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows;

SEC. 13. The repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture, or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide, and such statute shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper action or prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty, forfeiture, or liability.

The gentleman stated with great positiveness it did repeal these penalties. He is a good lawyer, and I only called his attention to that statute.

Mr. GOFF. I do not care to know the number of the section, what is it?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is section 13, chapter 2, of the Revised Statutes.

While on the floor I wish to correct a misapprehension my colleague [Mr. KEIFER] is under as to what I said respecting what took place some time ago in this House, in correcting the statement I made that the bill reported by the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay had become a law. I did not intend to and do not wish to be understood as retracting anything I then said in reference to the conduct of my other colleague from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], to which I then referred, save this one thing that the bill as it came from the committee passed the House and became a law as reported from the committee. When it passed the House it was beyond the scope and control of the committee. It had nothing to do with it. Therefore, what was stated at that time as far as respects the responsibility of the committee was entirely correct.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states that the provisions of this bill and the provisions of the amendment which I have offered are substantially identical, with the exception that attorneys resident here are not allowed in any case to charge for their services in prosecuting pension cases a fee exceeding $10. I assume that my friend is sincere in his conclusions as to the differences between the two propositions, and I do not know that he is not correct. The trouble, however, about his bill is that I have not had the opportunity, nor has the House nor any committee, as far as I am aware, had the opportunity, to give it that careful examination and consideration which all legislation should have in this respect, especially one involving so great and important an interest as that under consideration. So, while I shall not support his bill, I shall decline to do it upon the simple ground that I have not had the opportunity to give it that consideration which I think all important legislation should have before we are called to act upon it. In other words, I am not willing to trust even the careful preparation which he has given the subject without some opportunity to investigate it for myself, especially when I am to take it in comparison with a bill which has been matured by his committee both as to the original matter and the modifications of the bill which I have offered, making it conform to the changed conditions of circumstances since the act of July last.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I only desire to offer a suggestion with reference to perfecting the text of the amendment. I wish to know, in the first place, whether the gentleman has examined his amendment so carefully as to be able to state the effect of it in the repealing clause upon pending prosecutions under the act of July 4, 1884, and other acts that may be in conflict with the provisions of this amendment?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My friend from Ohio was obviously not listening to his colleague from Ohio a few moments ago, for if he had been he would have discovered the fact that, by consulting the thirteenth section of chapter 2 of the Revised Statutes, there is a general law providing that the repeal of a statute shall not affect pending prosecutions.

Mr. KEIFER. That does not apply in this case, I think.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I will read it if the gentleman desires it:

The repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture, or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide; and such statute shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any action or prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty, forfeiture, or liability.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, if the gentleman from Arkansas will allow me, I submit that that provision of the law does not refer to criminal matters at all, but to penalties attached to statutes disconnected with criminal prosecutions.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have not at hand decisions of any of the courts to sustain my views of the case, but I think the language of the act itself is clear, and I am satisfied that upon an examination it will be found to apply to all penal prosecutions instituted before the statute is repealed.

Mr. KEIFER. It relates only to penalties.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why leave any doubt in reference to the matter?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The language of the act is:

Shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper action or prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty, forfeiture, or liability.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; penalty, forfeiture, or liability; but it does not extend to criminal prosecutions where there may be fine or imprisonment as a mere punishment. It refers to statutory penalties, where there is a forfeiture, and that was obviously the intent of the law when it was passed.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. As I have said, I have no decisions at hand to sustain my view of the case, but I think if the gentleman from Ohio examines the subject he will be convinced.

Mr. KEIFER. There are numerous decisions in the States with which I am familiar where the same principle is involved.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me to state that this has direct reference to the absolute repeal of a statute. Now, if a statute be substituted for another, if it is merely an ingrafting of the provisions of one statute upon another statute, to take the place of a portion of a statute still in force, to which penalties are affixed, the penalty clause remains and stands in like manner toward the new statute as it did toward the old. There is the difficulty; and the gentleman will find that the difficulty does exist if he will examine the decisions bearing upon this subject.

There are two questions to be considered in connection with the matter: whether the statute is absolutely repealed, or whether or not the penalty has been so affected as to change the punishment to be inflicted for an infraction of the statute.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have no sort of question on the subject myself, but will state in response to the gentleman from West Virginia that while I do not recollect any cases in the Federal courts, either the lower or the higher courts, determining the question, it is res adjudicata in my own State that where one statute repeals another, and prior to the passage of the repealing act parties have been indicted under the original statute, the repeal does not release such parties, because the offense was committed prior to the repeal.

Mr. KEIFER. That is not the question presented here, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that we have gotten through with the Congressional campaign and have come down to the work of the committee in reference to the perfecting of this bill; and I am glad to know the earnest desire on the part of both gentlemen who have offered amendments to the present bill to protect the interests of the soldiers. Let us try to do that with a good purpose.

I do not like the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, but am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. I am opposed to that of the gentleman from Ohio because of the very difference that he has named. It is a form of class legislation. It handicaps the citizen soldier in the employment of his agent or attorney. I do not want, if I have a claim before the Department in Washington, to have this Congress say to me, "You must employ a man in a distant town or State and not the man who is here on the ground in the District of Columbia, even if you wish to do so." I do not say this, sir, in the interest of any claim agent, for I believe I do not know one in the District of Columbia.

But I had some experience myself at the close of the war. I employed some local attorneys and they charged me $100 and kept me on the rack a year and a half, while I was trying to collect my back pay and failed. I then employed an agent in the District of Columbia, and within three weeks after I employed him I had my pay, and I had only to pay him $25. I believe the soldiers themselves as a rule would prefer to employ men here who could go in person to the Departments; and I believe if a fee of $25 be allowed, and if payment be not made till the work is done, the claim will be soon got through.

The truth is, the real agents of the applicants for pensions are on this floor. We are the pack-horses for the soldiers' interests. These men get their $10 for filling a little blank worth 5 cents, while the members of Congress and the Senators do the work. But if a fee of $25 be allowed and be not paid till the work is done, that will get work out of these claim agents. And I believe that a man here in Washington familiar with the law, familiar with the debates in Congress, familiar with the rulings of the Departments, who can go in person and point out the defects in decisions and demand rehearings, can better serve the soldiers than the claim agents at our own homes in our own cities. This may be unpopular talk. I know I am not playing the part of a demagogue in making this speech. Nor would I intimate the gentleman offering the substitute has done so.

But I do say it is almost impossible to get competent men in the States to take the position of claim agent. I have had to urge and beg men in my State to take that position. I would be glad to have the business of claim agents built up at home; but this will not do it. There is not a reputable lawyer on this floor that would ever take the position of a claim agent; I will hazard the statement that not one of you gentlemen on either side would do so. You can not afford to do so even for $25 a claim.

I say, then, do away with this discrimination. It is an insult to the intelligence of the American Congress to say that a citizen of Washington may not be as honest and reputable as a citizen of Ohio or a citizen of Iowa. I have faith in my fellow-men. I have faith in the intelligence of the soldier as well as of any other class, and I wish to let him select for himself his agents and attorneys.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is clean cut and searching. It will guard against every danger and meet every necessity. From my intercourse with my fellow-soldiers I believe it will fully and comprehensively meet their desires and their necessities.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee desire to pass this bill and I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair). Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 35, noes 47.

So (further count not being called for) the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents in the State where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys in the District of Columbia."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This amendment does not restrict the residence to the county but to the State alone. It limits the right to contract for a fee of $25 to attorneys residing in the same State with the claimant. Now, I do think, Mr. Chairman, that it is important to offer better inducements to attorneys and agents at home with whom the claimant may be acquainted to take such cases. They can better prepare the evidence. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is mistaken in supposing that this work has mainly to be done here at Washington. Very little of it is to be done here or can be done here. It is mainly to be done at home. The affidavits of comrades, the evidence in fact to sustain the claim, must all come from outside the District of Columbia.

So far as record testimony goes my friend must know that claim agents here are not permitted to rummage the Departments and themselves examine the records. They have not access to them. They have no such rights. They must get them as attorneys or agents living in the States must get them. Our attorneys and agents at home, I believe, can and will better serve the claimants. They will prepare their cases. They will aid them in procuring the necessary evidence to sustain their claims. They must do the work anyway. There is very little that the agents here can do, but they gather here and get the claims into their hands because there is money in the thing.

I make no sweeping charge that all the claim agents here are rascals. Not at all. There are honorable gentlemen engaged in the business of claim agents and engaged in prosecuting pension claims. But we have here as claim agents hordes of men who are not professional lawyers. They may be barbers, shoemakers, saloon-keepers. There are among them men belonging to every other profession. Clerks in the Departments possibly are working up claims and getting claims into their hands for the sake of the fees that are in them. They can do the claimant very little good, while an attorney at home can; and if he is permitted to contract for $25 he will take the claim, while he could not afford to do it for $10. I think this is important. I think it is desirable to get these claimants out of the hands of the ghouls here at Washington.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, during the progress of this discussion I have sent out for the volume containing the only adjudication, so far as I am aware, in regard to the construction of this statute. It is a case in 3 Dillon, page 532, in which it is held specifically that this statute applies to penal as well as to civil prosecutions; so that I can say to my friend on the opposite side that my construction of this statute is substantially correct. The precise point has not been adjudicated, but the principle has been decided in the case to which I have just referred—the case of the United States vs. Ulrici.

I will say, however, that if there is any sort of doubt as to this being the proper construction I shall be willing to accept an amendment to make the matter perfectly clear.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, to the amendment of Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, there were—ayes 85, noes 22.

Mr. CANNON. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amendment prevails there will be a vote in the House.

Mr. CANNON. If there is to be a vote in the House, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The point that no quorum has voted is, as the Chair understands, withdrawn; and the amendment to the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the last clause of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas may be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the act approved July 4, 1884, and all other acts in conflict with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that this act take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas to the fact that the provision just read repeals the whole of the act of July 4, 1884. Of course that is not intended by the gentleman, as that act contains appropriations for the payment of pensions for the current year. I move to amend the last section of the gentleman's amendment so as to read:

That all of the provisions of the act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1884, relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases are hereby repealed: Provided, That as to offenses committed under said act all the provisions thereof shall remain in full force.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I accept that amendment as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was adopted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer an amendment to come in after the amendment which I have already offered and which has been adopted. I think when this amendment has been read the House will see its propriety and importance. I will not take time in discussing it. I only ask for a vote on it.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney residing in a State of which the claimant is a resident to enter into partnership with or otherwise to divide the fee of $25 with any attorney or agent residing in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANCOCK. Pending this amendment, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there will be no objection to the amendment, and I do not desire to discuss it.

Mr. HANCOCK. I withdraw my motion.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 81, noes 27.

The amendment of Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move to amend by adding after the amendment last adopted the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension agents and other officers of the United States already authorized by law to administer oaths are hereby authorized and directed to take the affidavits of pensioners to their quarterly pay vouchers without charge.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The object of this amendment is to save to the pensioners the money they now pay every three months for making affidavits to their vouchers that they are the identical persons entitled to the pension.

A MEMBER. No charge is made.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. A charge is made to the pensioners all over the country. They have to go before a notary or other officer authorized to administer oaths and pay 25 or 50 cents for each affidavit. As there are about 400,000 pensioners and an additional 350,000 claims pending, it amounts to a loss to pensioners, a direct loss, if the full fee is charged, of nearly $800,000 a year. It is an unfair tax on every pensioner in the United States. My amendment makes it the duty of the officer to take these acknowledgments without charge. Certainly as the Government requires them to make affidavit to the voucher, it should exempt the pensioners from any tax or charge on that account; they should receive the full pension allowed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. So far as Ohio is concerned it makes no charge.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we all have heard enough of Ohio. [Great laughter and applause.] Let us in Heaven's name talk about something else. [Renewed laughter.] I never knew what the Ohio idea was until this celebrated election case of Warner vs. Taylor came up to-day. [Laughter.]

But to return to my amendment. I know that pensioners all over the country are compelled to take that affidavit, and while it may be that they are not charged in Ohio for taking it, it is true they are charged in almost every other State for doing so. Why they are not charged in Ohio I do not know.

Mr. KEIFER. It is because the statute prohibits it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This will do no harm, then, to make the same law operative elsewhere. It makes it the duty of these officers to administer the oath without charge.

A MEMBER. What officer?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Any United States officers authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Carry out the Ohio idea all over the country and there will be no necessity for any such amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This prohibits any charge and makes it the general law for the taking of these affidavits without charge to the pensioner. I call for a vote on my amendment and hope every soldier's friend will vote for it.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 48.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, yes. There is no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. HANCOCK.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'HARA. I move the following amendment.

Mr. HANCOCK. There is to be no debate on it.

Mr. O'HARA. No, I do not expect any. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows.

After the word "available," in line 50, add the following:
"And hereafter the mode and manner provided by the law and regulations for the payment of white persons entitled to pensions shall apply to and govern the payment of all pensions."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe it is the law now, but if it is not it should be the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all right.

Mr. LONG. There is no objection to it.

Mr. HANCOCK. Let the vote be taken.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If this is not the law now, I am willing to have it so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the amendment has been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MATSON. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after the 4th day of March, 1885, the rate of pension for widows, minor children, and dependent relatives now on the pension-roll, or hereafter to be placed on the pension-roll, and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the adjudication of claims under this act, nor shall any such person be entitled to receive any compensation whatever for services or pretended services in making applications thereunder.

Mr. HANCOCK. I make the point of order on the amendment, in the first place, that it is new legislation; and, in the second place, that it is the substance of a bill already pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

That in all cases where a pensionable disability was incurred during the term of service of any soldier against whom no charge of desertion exists the disability shall be presumed to have been incurred while in the line of duty.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that that ought to come from another committee. It may be all right, but it has no place here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Not on the point of order.

Mr. HERBERT. I make the additional point that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move the following as an additional section:

That in all cases where a pensionable disability is shown to exist at the date of the filing of a claim for pension, it shall be presumed that such disability was incurred in the line of duty and during the time of enlistment of the claimant: Provided, That this presumption may be rebutted by competent proofs.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and the committee had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. CANNON. These amendments we ought to see in print before being required to vote upon them, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HANCOCK. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. HANCOCK. Then I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 51; noes 95.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which the Clerk will read.

The first amendment, offered by Mr. EVERHART, was read and agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The second amendment, offered by Mr. O'HARA, was read and agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The third amendment, offered by Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, was read.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to have a separate vote upon the last part of that amendment; not the repealing clause, but just preceding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it constitutes but one amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; but I ask a division of the question on the last proposition of the amendment. It is divisible, I think. I refer to the proposition relating to the discrimination against persons residing in the District of Columbia. It is but one amendment, it is true, in a certain sense, but it embraces several distinct propositions.

The SPEAKER. It has been always held in the House that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not divisible, being in the nature of an entire proposition to be voted upon by the House.

Mr. KEIFER. It is one entire proposition so far as the name is concerned, but it involves different propositions.

The SPEAKER. That question has been made, the Chair thinks, and frequently decided that when an amendment is reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, although it embraces several distinct propositions it is an entirety in itself to be voted upon, and is not divisible.

Mr. KEIFER. I have not examined the question with a view to ascertaining the precedents, but I think it has been held the other way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the uniform ruling in the House, both by his immediate predecessor as well as others, has been to treat such an amendment as an entirety.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is a verbal change which should be made, if I have understood the reading of the Clerk aright. The date June 28 should be June 20.

Mr. KEIFER. It can not be modified now. The whole thing is made so absurd that it had better be voted down.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That modification should be made if it is not already in the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. It can not be modified now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 114, noes 12.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that we had better have tellers.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that no quorum has voted?

Mr. CANNON. I make that point.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not insist upon it, since the vote has been very decided in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I think if we could see this amendment in print it would be more satisfactory, and we can vote on it to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations, or certainly a portion of the committee, are very anxious to get this bill out of the way to give place to other legislation that it is desired to proceed with to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. I will call my friend's attention to the fact that this legislation now sought to be made is to correct other legislation made hastily, and shows the folly of hasty legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. It is always wise to correct folly, and therefore I ask a vote.

Mr. CANNON. It is not wise to commit a folly in endeavoring to correct one.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. HANCOCK were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 145, noes 18.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This being a general appropriation bill, under the rule the yeas and nays will be taken upon its passage.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 174, nays 5, not voting 144; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.
Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:
A bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States court, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson, in the State of Nevada; and
A bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.
Mr. NEECE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Pending the question on the motion to adjourn,
The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War transmitting the annual report of the Mississippi River Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.
Mr. KING. I ask that the report of the Mississippi River Commission be printed without the maps.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will be so printed in the first instance under the order just made.
Mr. KING. Not unless the House so orders.
The SPEAKER. The order will be made that the report shall be printed as a House document without the maps. It would be very expensive to print those maps.

MILITARY ACADEMY CLASS OF 1886.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of cadets at the Military Academy, class of 1886, for legislation to secure appointments to the Army to members of the said class; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BURNES, by unanimous consent leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of James A. Price without leaving certified copies on file, no adverse report having been made thereon.
The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 20th ultimo, a report of the Chief of Engineers, accompanied by a report of Capt. James C. Post, Corps of Engineers, on the work for the improvement of Buchanan River, in West Virginia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting for the information of Congress papers showing the maintenance of the channel at the South Pass, Mississippi River, by Mr. James B. Eads, during the quarters ending March 9, 1884, June 9, 1884, September 9, 1884, and December 9, 1884, respectively; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

REPORT OF MISSOURI RIVER COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with law, the annual report of the Missouri River Commission; which, together with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition from the class which will be graduated at the United States Military Academy at West Point in June, 1886, praying for legislation which will secure appointments in the Army for those cadets who may be graduated that year; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARLAND. The other day I introduced a bill (S. 2428) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood. I now present her petition praying for a pension, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONAS presented a memorial of merchants of New York city, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a memorial of merchants of New York city, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Machiasport, Me., praying for the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of W. M. Folger, lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, and other officers of the Navy, praying for legislation in relation to rank and promotion in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present what is intended as a memorial, although it is addressed to me individually or officially, being a resolution of the Trades and Labor Assembly of the city of Saint Louis, composed of the representatives of the various labor organizations of that city, earnestly urging the passage of the bill to prohibit the importation of contract labor into the United States now before Congress and known as the Foran bill, and protesting against the ratification of the Spanish reciprocity treaty now before the Senate. I do not know whether the bill to prohibit the importation of contract labor has been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor. If it has not been, I ask that the memorial may be referred to that committee as a gentle reminder to them of the necessity of action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The foreign-contract-labor bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then let the memorial be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie upon the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the memorial of a large number of persons, who represent in substance that they are now settled upon and occupy what are known as the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory. I ask that their memorial may be read at length, omitting the names, and that the memorial may then be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the memorial presented by him be read at length, omitting the names. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the people of Oklahoma, assembled in public meeting, at the town of Stillwater, in Oklahoma, do most earnestly and respectfully request the immediate attention of Congress to the following facts:

Oklahoma was bought by the United States from the Creek and Seminole Indians eighteen years ago. It has been paid for in full. The title rests solely and exclusively in the United States. There are no limitations of any kind whatever. No Indian or tribe of Indians owns, or claims to own, controls, or claims to control, one foot of these lands.

No one disputes any of these statements, yet notwithstanding these plain and undeniable facts, and notwithstanding the further fact that all of the western part of our country has been settled and improved, exactly as we have settled and improved this country, in advance of official invitation, we have repeatedly been driven from our homes by military force, our houses burned, our property destroyed, and our bodies dragged hundreds of miles into out-of-the-way places, and held for weeks, beyond the reach of civil processes, and then dismissed without trial or explanation.

When we have cited laws to these men wearing Federal uniforms, and asked them for justice, they have cursed us and told us they cared nothing for laws, they had the power and would use it.

We thoroughly and with one accord believe that our right to make homes for ourselves and our families upon these lands would not have been questioned had it not been for the fact that rich cattle syndicates were here ahead of us.

These men are few in number, but strong in the use of unlimited capital.

They do not pretend to have even a lease of these lands from any source whatever, yet they hold and inclose them with wire fences, and the Federal Army is used as their private police.

We are now in Oklahoma again.

We are here with our axes and our plows. Hundreds and thousands of our friends are on their way to join us from all States of the West.

We are here to stay. We deny the right of any man, or mob of men, whether in uniform or plain clothes, to molest us.

We do most earnestly request that Congress will henceforth guarantee to us our plain and undeniable rights under the laws and Constitution of our country; and as a means to secure and maintain those rights, we request that Congress may immediately order the withdrawal of the Federal troops from our midst, and at as early a day as possible organize Oklahoma as a Territory of the United States, and provide for the appointment of a governor and the election of other necessary officers.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say in reference to the memorial that the subject-matter of it has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs for some considerable period of time, and while I do not deny that the subject is one of very great importance and may involve extended deliberation, I submit that prompt action is necessary in view of the fact that these persons are there. While they are there, technically at least, in violation of the law, or at all events in violation of the law as construed by the Attorney-General and as understood by the President, at the same time the violation is merely technical, as I think. The Congress has said heretofore that these lands should not be occupied by Indians. It can only be in any event a brief period of time when they must necessarily be open to settlement, and it seems to me that the time has come when Congress should say "yea" or "nay," not merely to the petition of these people, but to the situation which is presented by the very considerable body of land which is not now in occupancy by Indians and not designed to be occupied by them hereafter. I therefore venture to suggest that the Committee on Indian Affairs should take this matter up and dispose of it at as early a day as possible, and I think that would not only conduce to the interests of the General Government, but, perhaps, to a peace which is liable to be disturbed by the contact of forces down there on the part of the settlers on one side and on the part of the Government seeking to restrain the occupancy on the other.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from Kansas at the outset. Does the Senator contemplate any such immediate action as will meet the exigencies now existing there?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not want to interpose by getting into the domain of the committee; but I think, in consideration of the facts stated in the memorial, or so much of them as may be held to be without controversy, the committee would be warranted in saying "yea" or "nay" to the general proposition that the land should be opened to settlement by act of Congress. That may result from a variety of considerations of course; but that something should be said in view of what is clearly an emergency of the situation I have no doubt.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is aware that at the last session the committee were instructed to make inquiry into the title to Oklahoma, and after a careful consideration they reported that it could not be under existing title open to settlement, and that report was adopted by the Senate. I am aware of the serious condition of things at this moment in what is called Oklahoma; and my inquiry was whether the Senator contemplated such immediate action as would interfere with the authorities, or in any way undertake to put an end to the troubles down there at this time.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say, in regard to that matter, that while I presume it would be practically impossible that legislation should be finally passed to meet the immediate situation, there may be other things which could be done in some way which would make more emphatic the expressions than have heretofore been made or which would modify them in some way so as to have influence to prevent the breach of peace which is now threatened. I am not undertaking to put myself in the position of criticising the committee, or assuming any responsibility, or in any way complaining of the committee for considering at some length probably this question, which is quite a serious one, involving as it does not merely the disposal of the land to various settlers and the surrounding tribes of Indians, but also the question of local government. At the same time I do say it is one of those things that ought to be met in some way very promptly, and I hope to present to the committee itself at no very remote day some facts and circumstances bearing upon this question, which I think will tend to facilitate a decision.

Mr. DAWES. I assure the Senator that the committee are as anxious as they can be to meet the exigencies of this case, and will give him or any other Senator the largest opportunity to present any suggestions that will meet the difficulties which surround it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FAIR presented a memorial of merchants of New York city, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Steubenville, Ohio, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR presented a memorial of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of merchants, manufacturers, and shipowners of Boston, Mass., praying for the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of the Texas navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1042) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of Texas, reported it back, and moved indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2296) for the relief of Thomas A. McLaughlin, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 578) for the relief of Dennis W. Mullan, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PIKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2151) for the relief of William H. Davis, of Oakland, Cal., to report it adversely. The committee also instruct me to report the following resolution, referring the claim to the Court of Claims:

Resolved, That the claim of William H. Davis be transmitted, in accordance with the provisions of article 1, section 1059, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to the Court of Claims of the United States, together with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents appertaining thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire to have the resolution placed on the Calendar?

Mr. PIKE. I wish action upon it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why the necessity of passing a resolution of that kind? Has not the committee power to refer the claim to the Court of Claims?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is not proposed to refer it under the provisions of the so-called Bowman act.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to be referred under the general provisions?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Under the general provisions of the Revised Statutes.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1098) for the relief of V. B. Horton, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 2050) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Clark;

A bill (S. 640) for the relief of Rebecca Johnson;

A bill (S. 1392) to compensate John W. Smith for losses sustained by him during the war of the rebellion; and

A bill (S. 721) for the relief of Joseph W. Yates.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By direction of the Committee on Claims I submit a report which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (S. 864) for the relief of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson; the bill (S. 866) for the relief of John F. Kranz; and the bill (S. 1167) for the relief of the estate of Marcus Walker, beg leave to report that, having referred the said claims to the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883, said claims have been returned by the said court to the committee as not coming within the jurisdiction of the court under the act referred to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to say, in connection with the report just read from the desk, that each of those bills represents a large class of claims now pending before the committee. The committee had doubt as to whether those classes of claims came within the provisions of the so-called Bowman act. The bills were referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of the act. That construction has been obtained, and the committee will be governed hereafter in transmitting cases to the Court of Claims according to the decision of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report will be placed on file.

Mr. SHEFFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1163) for the relief of Anson Atwood; and

A bill (S. 1901) for the relief of William H. Whiting.

Mr. SHEFFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of E. A. Farr, agent of the estate of S. O. Baker, deceased, praying compensation on account of supplies furnished United States soldiers during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

SUPPORT OF DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians, have instructed me to report back the same, and to ask, owing to the exigencies of the case, that it may be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It appropriates $50,000, to be immediately available, to be applied to the support and maintenance of the Indians at the Crow, Fort Belknap, Fort Peck, and Blackfeet agencies, in Montana Territory.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that the occasion for this special appropriation is all set forth in the RECORD this morning. The documents are somewhat voluminous, yet I can not but think that any Senator who has read them will be satisfied that this action is demanded by every consideration of justice.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced bill (S. No. 2506) for the relief of Timothy McCormick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 108) authorizing the Secretary of War to assist in canceling the debt and in enlarging and improving the grounds and collections of Washington's Headquarters in Morristown, N. J., and in securing suitable ground in which to gather the remains of Revolutionary soldiers there buried and in erecting a monument over the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada; and

A bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" being in order, the Chair lays before the Senate the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1) to amend section 2 of an act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1879."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Kansas has kindly informed me that he would consent to have that go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Vermont to make that motion?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the further consideration of the motion be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES, SO CALLED.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I ask that the resolution introduced by me on the 15th of December be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it in terms to no other. The representatives of the people, sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly, may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employment and interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes or rejects, than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That so-called reciprocity treaties, having no possible basis of reciprocity with nations of inferior population and wealth, involving the surrender of enormously unequal sums of revenue, involving the surrender of immensely larger volumes of home trade than are offered to us in return, and involving constitutional questions of the gravest character, are untimely and should everywhere be regarded with disfavor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the substance of the declarations in the resolution just read were copied from a report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I much regret, however, to be unable to ascribe the credit of its authorship to the committee of the Forty-eighth Congress.

The magnitude of the subject embraced in the resolution would seem to justify full and free discussion. Differing in opinion from those whom I greatly esteem, it will be my duty to give utterance to no sentiments not based upon my profoundest convictions. If the President, the Secretary of State, our envoy extraordinary, and all the newspapers may present elaborate statements relating to the new gospel of "reciprocity treaties," with the whole text fully displayed, it would seem passing strange that Senators, of all the world, must keep a padlock on their lips and remain silent. Though I am inflexibly opposed to revolutionizing all American traditions by having our revenue laws tampered with by those to whose especial care they were never constitutionally intrusted, it would be vain for me to indulge in any dreams of successful resistance to the apparent numbers and the power now enlisted in this rampant policy, but I may, at least, preserve the symmetry of my record to the last moment on the general subject, and present some special objections to the latest pattern of so-called "reciprocity," to which, under the rules of the Senate, I regret to say my remarks must be limited. Let me here say that some of the points now to be submitted were presented in my remarks made in executive session on the Mexican treaty, which the Senate kindly gave me permission to publish.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

When the question of a reciprocity treaty was first presented to the Senate forty years ago, it was unanimously decided that it would be a grave and dangerous invasion of the prerogative of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, as well as of the prerogative of the House of Representatives as to its exclusive power to originate revenue bills. The record shows (and it was long since made public) that two reports on the Zollverein treaty, with Prussia and other members of the Germanic Confederation, were made at different times by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, both reaching the same adverse conclusion—one by Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, when the treaty was laid upon the table, as the least offensive mode of rejection, and one later, by Mr. Archer, of Virginia, when, at the request of the President for further consideration, the treaty was squarely and unanimously rejected—including even the vote of John C. Calhoun, although, while Secretary of State, the treaty had received his perfunctory support. That the standing of Mr. Choate, as a lawyer of profound learning, and the sound judgment of Mr. Archer, the long-trusted Congressional leader on foreign affairs, peculiarly qualified them to handle the subject, not only justly but with pre-eminent ability, will not be controverted even by the present distinguished Committee on Foreign Relations. Notwithstanding it was broadly claimed by Mr. Archer that the treaty would have promoted our interests, it was resolutely refused, and solely on the ground of paramount constitutional objections. This adverse determination was again and finally confirmed in 1848 by a record of the yeas and nays, with every member, both of the Democratic and Whig parties then present, in the negative, and at a time when among the members of the Senate were to be found, besides many others of national renown, such celebrities as Calhoun, Crittenden, Berrien, Badger, Corwin, Dix, Hamlin, Mangum, Bell, Davis of Mississippi, "Honest John Davis" of Massachusetts, Mason of Virginia, and Johnson of Maryland. We may well feel proud even to be members of a body which has been decorated with names wearing such enduring national luster. I think the Senate would willingly be refreshed with at least a single paragraph from one of these adverse reports, from which it will be seen that my resolution has been taken, and I will therefore read the following from that of June 14, 1844:

In the judgment of the committee, the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is, indisputably, that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress.

They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the representatives of the people, sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly; may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes or rejects, than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government.

Mr. President, this was the well-considered and determinate argument accepted by a united Senate, solemnly bound as we are by an oath, and though floods of eloquence may come, and the winds of rhetoric beat against it, it will stand, for it is founded on the bed-rock of the Constitution. Its high and thorough seriousness, Senators will find, can not be dismissed with the sneer of silence, nor can its cogency be checkmated even by an imposing front of numbers. Antagonism to the constitutional position then announced by the Senate will not win future colossal reputations.

I regret not to find myself in accord with some of the ablest constitutional lawyers of the Senate at the present time; but, as humble as I feel myself to be, I am not ashamed to appeal from the new to the old Senate, and to remain an adherent to the constitutional doctrine asserted and promulgated by some of the most illustrious names that have adorned the history of the American Senate. One of the present distinguished Senators from Massachusetts—with whom on this question it is my misfortune to differ—has told me that "the great expounder of the Constitution," a grander name than even that Africa gave to Scipio, was once reported to have said, "I hope I know the Constitution of my country better than to think a reciprocity treaty is constitutional." If reciprocity treaties were unconstitutional when this declaration was made by Mr. Webster, they are surely none the less so now, and my friend the learned Senator from Massachusetts may find, even in the wayside opinions of his distinguished predecessor, "the bones of a giant."

Mr. HOAR. To which Senator from Massachusetts does the honorable Senator from Vermont allude?

Mr. MORRILL. I refer to the Senator now addressing me.

Mr. HOAR. The authority for Mr. Webster's opinion is good; but the Senator's authority for mine—he says I differ from him—is not good.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very happy to hear it, Mr. President.

The powers separately and specially granted by the Constitution to one branch of our Government can not be assumed or held in common by any other branch at its pleasure. The invasion of the jurisdiction of one by another can not be accounted less than rank usurpation. Any other interpretation of the Constitution would be derogatory not only to the Constitution itself, but to its far-sighted framers. The President is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, but this gives him no authority to invade the power of Congress "to raise money to support the Army and Navy." The President, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, may make treaties, but under cover of this authority no constitutional treaty can be made "to regulate commerce with foreign nations" or to initiate "revenue bills," any more than to establish a "uniform law of bankruptcy" or "of naturalization;" and these, together with all other powers which were specially confided to Congress or to the House of Representatives by the Constitution, stand as a flaming sword against all encroachments of the Executive, and forever limit and exclude the reach of its treaty-making power.

The House of Representatives has ever been open-eyed as to the least apparent Senatorial usurpation of the power to originate revenue bills, and the Senate in all controversies on this point has promptly yielded to the claims of the House. This exclusive power of the House is consecrated in all of our earliest traditions, and will ultimately be found impregnable, whether threatened by the Senate alone or with the aid of the auxiliary forces of the Executive.

I know that the constitutional barrier is assumed to be avoided, if a profane illustration may be pardoned, by whipping His Sooty Majesty around the stump, or by obtaining the subsequent consent of Congress, or of the House of Representatives, to the stipulated requirements of the treaty; but this consent subjects Congress and the House to a state of suspended animation, and is only a flimsy subterfuge, by which the full power of Congress, or of the House of Representatives, for a term of years, is to be curtailed and abridged. In the first place, the Constitution does not contemplate the action of the House at all upon treaties. All legitimate treaties must be made by the Executive, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, and, when so made, no action of the House can amend or change them or defeat them by a legislative veto. But, in the examples of hybrid treaties now officially made known to the public, the vital part of each treaty is to be carried into effect, not by the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, but by a bare majority of each House. The rule of majorities is to prevail in contravention to fundamental law. In the second place, the action of the House, or even of Congress, in 1885 can not impair, abridge, or take away the legislative authority of the next or of any succeeding Congress "to regulate commerce" nor of the House of Representatives "to originate revenue bills." Nor can this legislative authority be abdicated even by making the Executive the heir apparent. No act of the executive branch of the Government or of Congress can suspend, repeal, or blot out plain provisions of the Constitution. If such provisions could be suspended and renounced for six years by a temporary majority of Congress or of the House of Representatives, they could of course be suspended or renounced for twenty years or a hundred. It appears to me, therefore, that any treaty which encroaches upon the power to regulate commerce or upon that to originate revenue bills involves a plain, open, and palpable violation of the Constitution.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield for a question? I would ask the Senator if in the early treaties of peace commercial advantages were not——

Mr. MORRILL. I should rather the Senator would not ask any questions until I get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The Senator from Vermont declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MORRILL. It may be said that the power to regulate commerce and to originate revenue bills will remain in full force in spite of treaties, and may be still exercised at any time, and, if so exercised, would abrogate and, as the latest law, supersede all conflicting treaties. This may be true, but its exercise in defiance of treaties would be a flagrant breach of good faith, for which the fullest reparation might be demanded and a very sufficient provocation for a declaration of war by the party betrayed. The violence to the Constitution done through the making of a reciprocity treaty would be very lamely undone by any violence to the treaty itself.

The terms of these treaties appear to provide that they must be carried into effect by virtue of laws yet to be passed by Congress, and thus a dramatic foregone conclusion is to be rehearsed and enacted on the Congressional stage as a pageant of statecraft. If the treaties were to be operative when ratified, as it appears very innocently and rather haltingly to have been originally provided in the Mexican treaty before it was amended by the Senate, then any action of Congress or of the House of Representatives would be contemptuously disregarded, as will be sure to happen whenever the epidemic of reciprocity treaties shall so far prevail as to become the diseased and chronic policy of the country; but if treaties are to become operative by subsequent laws to be passed by Congress, it will be an introduction of a third and unknown party to the treaty-making power for which we have no warrant in the Constitution, and the deluded House of Representatives, like Samson shorn of his locks, will wake up to find its strength has departed. Not only will its share of power to regulate commerce and its exclusive power to originate revenue bills be gone, but its consent once given to a seven years' reciprocity treaty may be indefinitely elongated and perpetuated by a subsequent treaty to which its consent may no longer be held essential by the executive department.

To my blunt sense, if I have any sense, it appears strange how Senators learned in the law can regard the confession and avoidance contained in the eighth article of the Mexican treaty as anything less than a limping subterfuge, designed to escape a plain provision of our Constitution, and, as here presented, as I shall hereafter attempt to show, without even the excuse of any healthy national advantages. It would seem to contain an admission that the Executive and the Senate have unlawfully originated an illegitimate revenue bill, and this graceless bantling, left in a state basket at the door of the House of Representatives, the Executive proposes to legitimize by procuring a trustless and unveracious certificate from the House of its legislative fatherhood, although in truth it was a bill previously concocted and brought forth in the precise terms of the treaty with Mexico and with the same godfathers; and thus the House has been solemnly, perhaps seductively, urged to cheat itself, if not the world, by the farce of appearing to originate a bill which it dare not even amend, and which is already showing some signs of the decrepitude of age.

It is an insidious method by which the vastly important power of the House of Representatives over all revenue bills may, with an ambitious Executive, become obsolete and utterly valuless. The whole field of regulating trade and commerce by a tariff on imports may thus be opened to secret invasion, patch by patch, and twenty treaties may as properly be concocted as one, leaving only tattered remnants of tariff laws to be dealt with by Congress. A reciprocity treaty necessarily abandons protection by any tariff upon all the articles enumerated, and equally abandons all revenue and power to obtain revenue therefrom during the existence of the treaty. It is a measure clearly as inconsistent with the idea of "revenue only" as with that of "protection." It is hodge-podge free trade with special favorites only, and invidious restriction against all others.

If this departure from the revered example of our fathers is in harmony with our Constitution, I fail, and I think future patriots and statesmen, as well as the common people, will fail to so understand it. Friendly to all nations, they would proffer equal generosity to all. For the solid and enduring reputation of the Senate itself, sound policy dictates a prudent exercise only of the constitutional powers clearly granted, and the avoidance of all suspicious enlargements and doubtful amplifications. We can not afford to demolish the accepted theory of a republican government by sanctioning the initiation of revenue bills by the Executive. We can not afford to change the Constitution by merely a new interpretation, and without any change of the fundamental law.

THE PRETENDED PRECEDENTS.

The claim that the Mexican treaty originated in the House of Representatives, because the "sundry civil bill" of 1884 contained an appropriation "for the salaries and expenses of a commission to negotiate a commercial treaty with Mexico," is untenable, for the sufficient reason that commercial treaties may be of many descriptions and are daily negotiated, in fact nearly all being entitled treaties of "commerce and navigation;" but they have never been understood as synonymous with reciprocity treaties undertaken solely to regulate tariffs on imports; and if the "sundry civil" appropriation—doubtless prompted by and originating with the executive department—had borne the slightest hint of its secret "reciprocity" purpose, it would have encountered prompt opposition in both branches of Congress. Secrecy, as well before as after negotiation, possibly best enables such treaties to prosper. Congress can not give to the Executive its power of attorney in advance to make a tariff by treaty; and were that even possible, Congress, under the new patent theory, should at least be allowed to see such a tariff, even if not permitted to originate it. But Congress can only make a tariff uniform for all the world, and not for one foreign nation alone.

The further claim that in 1803, upon the Louisiana purchase from France, there was a precedent for "reciprocity treaties" in the provision of the treaty then made, that French ships for twelve years should be subjected to no greater duty on tonnage and merchandise than that paid by the citizens of the United States, is more untenable or simply preposterous. This was merely a condition precedent to obtaining full and complete possession of and jurisdiction over the territory for which we had made a bargain. France gave us no reciprocal privileges of any kind, but for twelve years retained a part of her original rights.

We made another convention in 1831 with France, our ancient ally, by which we limited for ten years the maximum duties upon red and white wines, in order to obtain the sum of twenty-five million francs for the unlawful seizure and confiscation of the vessels of United States citizens. There was not a shadow of "reciprocity" by which France made any reduction of duties in favor of the products of the United States, although on our part a weak concession was made—never to be again repeated—and made to obtain the payment of a just and long-delayed demand. Even this limitation of duties, and so hedged about as it was in consequence of the "favored-nation" conditions of our treaties, gave rise to reclamations by other governments for the excess of duties paid on wines above that imposed on French wines, and Daniel Webster, whose fame is not yet wholly eclipsed, as Secretary of State conceded the justice and legality of the claims.

Thanks are abundantly due to those who have revived the memory of the past. The advocates of reciprocity treaties appear willing to accept the thinnest of gossamer supports when they venture to claim that there is any example of a reciprocity treaty in the first sixty-five years of the history of the Government. There is none such, or none prior to 1854, and the treaty of that date was abrogated and stamped with the ban of the Government at the earliest possible moment.

EVERYWHERE INCURABLY WRONG.

If I could easily pass by, as I can not, the insuperable constitutional objections to reciprocity treaties, there are other grave and scarcely less substantial objections to the policy of such treaties. The most intelligent statesmen of the world "let them alone severely." Not a first-class government of Europe, so far as I am advised, now tolerates such treaties. Throughout the whole horizon none are visible even to reciprocity star-gazers—saving our own twinkling and pitiful show. England would be glad to make a treaty compact with the United States for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada, if that, sweetened by the bonbons and ribbons of occasional knighthoods, would keep the Dominion loyal, as well as proud and contented to furnish contingents to maintain British supremacy elsewhere; but she never permits the Canadas to offer favors to which Great Britain is not to become an equal participant, and never proposes to be a principal party to reciprocity herself. If we were to propose that American tobacco and whisky should be received duty free by Great Britain, and should offer all proper equivalents, the "no" of the British lion would resound across the Atlantic. But to some of our home administrations, I fear, it has happened that too many of their members have felt obliged to have a reciprocity treaty, like the small-pox, once in their lives, and it were to be wished that the malady would no more return in the one case than in the other.

The Cobden commercial convention with France was not a reciprocity treaty—which would properly only include one and the same list of articles to be made duty-free by both parties—but it was, like the pattern which threatens us, a give-and-take contract, one government freeing from duty certain articles and the other government freeing from duty certain other articles; and yet it proved fatally disastrous to the entire silk industry of England, and was very galling and detrimental in other directions to various important interests which have been loud in adverse criticisms. In France the Cobden treaty crippled their revenue, after the war with Germany, so seriously that the government of President Thiers urgently asked to be relieved from its oppressive terms, but England coldly refused, and insisted upon all that was "nominated in the bond." As quickly, under the provisions of the treaty, as France had the power, the Cobden treaty was terminated, and wherever or whenever mooted since there has been no chance of its renewal. We suffered a great and similar embarrassment from 1860 to 1864 from our Canadian reciprocity treaty. When such treaties are made, the resources of the nation, the sinews of war, are more or less tied up for a term of years, and even defensive wars must be dreaded, and peace, however ignominious, maintained at any price.

AT WAR WITH THE "MOST FAVORED NATION" CONDITIONS OF ALL OTHER TREATIES.

Among the oldest and ripest statesmen of Europe it is held and believed that "the most favored nation" stipulations, now to be found in nearly all international treaties, have some potential and enforceable meaning. If any production of one nation is subjected to a less duty than that imposed upon a similar production of some other nation, no matter whether the difference has been brought about by legislation or by treaty or by both combined, it would seem to be a substantial violation of all compacts which set forth that "no other or greater duties shall be imposed than those which are paid upon the productions of the most favored nation."

Every fresh example in the line of a possible future settled policy of select and special favoritism will be found dangerous and in conflict with our plighted faith given in treaties having "the most favored nation" provisions with between thirty and forty other nations. Any of these foreign powers strong enough to assert its rights or to enforce its compacts will scarcely fail to make any grievance of this sort known and to seek prompt redress.

Since the date of our treaty with Mexico Great Britain has suddenly resumed her diplomatic relations with Mexico, the latter having also mollified British creditors with new promises, and the first fruit of this sudden pledge of eternal friendship appears to have been a short treaty by which Great Britain has been restored to the footing of "the most favored nation," as has been still more recently accomplished with Spain. This has not been done with an aimless purpose, and whatever rights accrue will most likely be unflinchingly exacted.

In a former speech of mine the following statement was made of historic facts:

> At the first rumor of the Zollverein treaty, negotiated by Mr. Wheaton in 1844, Lord Aberdeen notified Mr. Everett, our minister in London, that Great Britain would claim an equal relaxation of duties in their favor, and Mr. Everett admitted the propriety of the claim, provided it was accompanied by the same equivalents. To this Lord Aberdeen responded that he conceived that by the convention of July 3, 1815, we should be bound to admit British fabrics on payment of the same duties as the Germans without any such conditions.

The treaty, however, having been rejected by the Senate, no complications followed, although enough were here abundantly indicated.

Let me call attention to the elaborate terms of a treaty made, obviously with all of the renowned skill of the German school of diplomacy, by Germany with Mexico so lately as 1882, Article X of which is as follows:

> No other or greater duties shall be imposed in the territory of either of the contracting parties upon the importation, re-exportation, or transportation of natural or manufactured productions of the other party than those which are paid upon the same class of productions of the most favored nation.

These terms are comprehensive and much too plain to be misinterpreted. Without any conditions whatever each party is solemnly bound to the other not to impose any other or greater duties than those paid upon the same class of productions of the most favored nation. Germany, now armed at all points, and more aggressive than even when ruled by Frederick the Great, perhaps still sore from our rejection of a similar treaty with her in 1848, will not lack the energy needful to assert all of her rights, and possibly might not much regret some provocation to enforce them, if by so doing she might plant a thorn in the side of a republic.

Among the most impassioned supporters of reciprocity treaties here, no one has ever contended that any nation, enjoying by treaty the promised advantages of "the most favored nation," might not, by a tender to us of equal terms, become entitled to all of the concessions granted by us to any party to a reciprocity treaty. If, then, Germany were to offer to receive from us free of duty ice and sausages, as well as all the other rattle-trap articles which by the proposed treaty Mexico offers to us, there can be no doubt that Germany would be entitled to all the privileges now to be yielded by us to Mexico, and the cheap tobacco and cheap sugar of Germany would also here find, perhaps, a new and most desirable market. Or, if Germany were to offer like terms to Mexico, then all the concessions made to the United States by Mexico must be accorded to Germany.

But, as I have already shown, it is more than doubtful whether or not a fair construction of the "most favored nation" clause in treaties does not alone entitle the party to have its productions subjected to no other or greater duties than are paid by any other nation, and without any reciprocal concessions. The phraseology of all such treaties is absolutely and wholly free from all conditions whatsoever. It appears to me, therefore, that it would be wise and prudent to avoid such obviously serious and wide-extending complications, and also especially wise to steer clear of any entanglements with foreign nations tending to restrict and circumscribe our freedom to legislate, whether in peace or war, upon the subject of increasing or reducing the national revenue.

LITTLE FOREIGN TRADE ACQUIRED FOR MUCH HOME TRADE SURRENDERED.

But, it is said, we must do something to build up and extend our foreign commerce—to which I agree—and to do this it is strangely proposed at once to surrender much more of our markets at home than is offered to us abroad—to which I do not agree. We are asked, so to say, to throw into the sea a greater amount of bait than will be returned in the catch of fish. Eleven years of this overbaited traffic, giving up superior markets in exchange for inferior markets, did not win the commercial or political friendship of the Canadas. Even during the existence of the so-called reciprocity treaty with them, their friendship was gauged infinitely below the price we paid for it. They would trade with us, but, like Shylock and Lord John Russell, they thought to catch us on the hip and "feed fat the ancient grudge." Financial benefits of treaties are never so far appreciated by nations as to create obligations of conscience for any returns. They are bargains without warranty as to the value given or received, sure to end in the discontent of the party overreached. Since the abrogation of the Canadian reciprocity treaty our trade with the Canadas has been larger and much more advantageous than ever before, being even larger than that of Great Britain. Were any treaty in force, to that fact alone the credit would be falsely ascribed. It may be well to recall precisely the wretched results of our Canadian reciprocity experiment. Our exports to Canada in 1855 were $20,828,676, but under the operation of reciprocity then commenced they dwindled in twelve years down to $15,243,834, while the exports of Canada to the United States increased from $12,182,314 to $46,199,470. When the treaty began the balance of trade had been $8,000,000 annually in our favor, and that paid in specie, but at the end the balance against us to be paid in specie in a single year was $30,000,000. Here was a yearly positive loss of over five millions of our export trade and a loss of thirty-eight millions of specie—all going to enrich the Canadas at our expense. This is the sore lesson of bitter experience.

The time is long past when nations can be enormously enriched by any excessive profits upon foreign trade. Even semi-barbarous colonies, however expensively maintained, resist the utter commercial enslavement of free trade. The universal expansion of manufactures, with gigantic production everywhere conspicuous, now presents unprecedented and many-sided competition, and the margin of net profits in distant commerce is reduced to very fine points and subject to many contingencies. It is only those articles produced by cheaper labor than anywhere else, or specialties not to be found elsewhere, that are even tolerably sure of a remunerative market, and then largely dependent on the cheapest transportation. National wealth must now and hereafter be mainly created by labor at home; and the home market is the only one of value over which any nation now has absolute control. Until trade in our own country becomes poorer than that abroad, our people will not seek to establish foreign trading posts. While foreigners, though handicapped by our duties upon imports, are still able, as in 1883, to send us annually manufactures to the amount of $460,000,000, we can not expect to rival them in other markets upon equal terms until the wages of labor in America shall have been razeed and brought down to the miserable level of wages abroad. Foreign trade gained by such a reduction of wages would be a calamitous degradation of American laboring men, and as much to be shunned as pestilence or famine. The day has gone by when silver spoons are to be found at the end of a rainbow, or when glass beads can be swapped for nuggets of gold. The splendor of the colonial system of Holland and Spain has vanished, and that of Great Britain, though still imperial, is environed with perils no less imperial. Disraeli, when chancellor of the exchequer in 1852, wrote to Lord Malmesbury that "These wretched colonies will all be independent, too, in a few years, and are a millstone around our necks." The monopoly of colonial trade was denounced by Adam Smith long ago as "mere loss instead of profit," and the monopoly of reciprocity trade can not be any better. We want no millstones around our necks.

But we can follow the advice of Washington and place our people at the summit of civilization and prosperity by cultivating peace with all nations and by seeking entangling reciprocity alliances with none. When any reductions of our tariff occur, we can tender the uniform benefit to all nations and excite the ill-will of none. We can, notwithstanding investments in ocean carrying trade yield little or no profit, show some favors to our shipping interests, rather than lean upon those who care not for us. American goods in British bottoms will always be apt to find poor and reluctant markets.

We may at least give ample remuneration to our own flag when carrying United States mails. We can also send able and wide-awake American ministers and consuls—knowing more of commercial business than of Apollo's lute—not only to Mexico but to every other government on the American continent, charged with the duty of making our Government and the country, the people and all of their manifold productions, better known, showing to them that we go down to the sea in ships, proving to them that we are not only potential neighbors, but really most enterprising friends, good enough for "human nature's daily use," and ever ready to meet them in any good work more than half way, as Mexico will find should any future Maximilian invade their territory.

It is parsimony to fit out one man to represent the United States as an itinerant minister at the capitals of three or four different nations. The State Department, so far as our foreign intercourse is concerned, and when not pregnant with unhealthy admiration of reciprocity treaties, is the most economical department of the Government. A more liberal representation of our country and its flag everywhere abroad should not be withheld; and our consuls should also be selected for well-known capacity to render active and efficient service, and not because they have neither ability nor industry to earn a living at home.

RECIPROCITY WITH MEXICO OR ANY INFERIOR COUNTRY IMPOSSIBLE.

Unwilling as I am to disparage the resources of any people, yet in making a national compact we should be derelict in duty to our own people were we to proceed wholly unmindful of the resources and responsibility of the party with whom we are negotiating. The rare beauty of the landscape and the natural advantages of the soil and climate of Mexico have been recognized through three hundred years of colonial bondage and fifty years of revolutionary vicissitudes. Her elevated plateaux, with their wondrous fertility when artificially watered, bring forth all of the products of the tropical, semi-tropical, and temperate zones. Unlimited northern grazing fields, vacated by the buffalo, give room for immense herds of cattle. Minerals everywhere abound, and silver seems to come forth from every smitten rock. The religion and culture of Southern Europe, such as it happened to be, were early sought to be imposed upon her people, overthrowing, indeed, human sacrifices and other Aztec superstitions; but with the departure of superstitions much of the early arts and of traditional Mexican splendors have also departed. The history of the country has been unfortunate, and has not kept pace in enterprises of "pith and moment" with that of her northern neighbors. Though once "loved and lost" by Spain, the mourning mother of colonies, brave soldiers and strong leaders of men have from time to time appeared in Mexico, but among her variously mingled and commingled inhabitants the material for stable human advancement in the principles and methods of free government, of law and order, has not, unless very lately, been in the ascendency, and its future industrial achievements are likely to depend too much upon colonies pushed by the intrepid greed of adventurers, not only from the United States, but from other countries and other hemispheres, when attracted by the extraordinary temptations we have proposed to offer.

A large amount of commerce with a country three-fourths of whose people are non-consumers of any foreign merchandise and contented to live almost exclusively upon corn and beans is impossible. Their whole trade, if we were to have it all, would hardly be more than that of one of our second-class cities, and the whole yearly value of the exports of all her states, as well as of their manufactures, is perhaps eclipsed by that of Texas, a State which broke away from Mexico, and so recently leaped fully grown into our Union. Outside of the precious metals, the entire exports of Mexico in 1883 amounted only to $12,178,937. The surplus available for foreign commerce will be found insignificant, and will furnish a slender and hopeless basis for reciprocal trade.

The character and habits of their population are almost insurmountable impediments to a large and progressive growth of commerce, which must always be based upon the natural and habitual industry of the people. One million only of the nine or ten million of her people are of pure Spanish lineage, the least industrious and the least bony race of Europe, holding, like their ancestors, that labor is beneath their dignity. Has any one heard of even moderate achievements, during recent centuries, of this proud and once prosperous race in any branch of trade or of laborious industry? Three or more million of the inhabitants of Mexico are of mixed breeds, African, Spanish, and Indian, the latter largely predominating; and the remainder, of about 5,500,000, are purely of the old aboriginal Indian stock, represented in the northern regions of Mexico by strong tribes of wild savages, most prosperous when at war with the more civilized inhabitants. This is the condition of the people—stamped with the features of their exhausted volcanoes and still troubled with earthquakes—upon whom the United States are urged to rely to build up a great and prosperous trade! On credit they may buy all we have to sell, but it will be Mexican credit, with all that implies of delay and insolvency, tempered by peonage. They are people living in a climate requiring for the major part less clothing than suffices for our blanketed Indians, and will be content to live as they long have lived, being races, whether pure or mixed, which never have been and are not soon likely to become producers of surplus commodities for sale or export.

A reciprocity treaty with the United States, on just and equal terms, is a financial impossibility, and could not be made, even by the illustrious hero of Appomattox (for whom I have great respect), except with a nation having an equal population, with a corresponding purchasing and consuming capacity. But no nation on the globe can offer these terms. Our acceptance of the "bad best," or of inferior reciprocity proposals is but the acceptance of international communism. Few nations are our equals in numbers, and no nation is comparable to the United States in the annual per capita production of wealth, nor consequently in the power of national expenditure and consumption. These facts alone forbid reciprocity treaties, which with us must always involve, as they do now, an equal exchange, no better than would be that of the American Lexington or Morgan horse and Jay-Eye-See for the Mexican mustang and stump-tail mule.

Notwithstanding these transparent facts, it is seriously proposed to give to Mexico, having only the comparatively small and heterogeneous population of 9,600,000, an opportunity, so far as the treaty goes, soon to enjoy on terms of equality the trade with over 60,000,000 of people, and a trade infinitely more valuable than that of any other country. I am unwilling to dilute the prosperity of the American people with such a sorry admixture.

I say this not forgetting that by the terms of the treaty itself Mexico is to have privileges immensely greater than those proposed for the United States. We are to open a great market, where the scale of wages is very high, for the chief natural productions of Mexico, and in return are offered a petty market for comparatively petty things where the scale of wages is very low. This kind of reciprocity may be illustrated by an incident in Scott's novel of "The Pirate," where Mordaunt and Magnus Troil sat down to drink brandy and water—that is, according to Scott, Magnus drank the brandy and Mordaunt the water. Obviously, here Mexico takes the brandy and the United States water only. Even St. John would not accept water on such terms.

It should not be overlooked that power has been reserved in article 5 of the treaty by which Mexico is free to make changes in her import duties by treaty with any other governments. When she does this our proposed pale-faced exclusive privileges, trivial as they may be, will grow "fine by degrees and beautifully less." Of course parties who make reciprocity treaties with us whenever it may be for their interest will make them with others. The chief European powers will not remain idle spectators of any monopoly of trade on our part obtained through treaties, but, if found to be of any value, will demand and receive equal favor.

WHATEVER MEXICAN AGRICULTURISTS GAIN AMERICANS MUST LOSE.

The treaty will be found to bear heavily upon our agriculturists—upon the owners of land. I do not think this class of our people are in a mood to be easily reconciled to additional and uncalled-for burdens. If there is a single article from the United States to be admitted into Mexico free of duty which will benefit farmers, planters, graziers, or owners of land, I have failed to discover it; but all there is of real importance to be admitted free of duty here, when coming from Mexico, will be found to be products of the soil or of pasturage, and all will come into most unwelcome competition with our own people. Look at the list of items we are to receive, and see if the facts are not as I have stated—for example: barley, beef, eggs; esparto and other grasses, and pulp for the manufacture of paper; fruits; heniquen, sisal hemp, and other like substitutes for hemp; molasses, straw (unmanufactured), sugar, tobacco, vegetables, wood, and timber.

These articles, for the most part, admit of indefinite augmentation, and the amount which we may hereafter receive from the cheaper lands of Mexico, when cultivated in large haciendas by companies and coolies or by foreign emigrants (as have been those of Hawaii), should the treaty become operative, can no more be measured by the last year's productions than could the present crop of sugar in Hawaii have been measured by the crop at the date of the Hawaiian treaty. Mexico is a country with immense pasturage for sheep and cattle. The reciprocity offered, therefore, may be said to have "straw upon its horns," always among Spaniards the sign of dangerous bulls, and much pushing competition will be found lurking in every field. The climate and soil of nearly every State in Mexico admit of the production of tobacco and sugar. Not alone our own people, but other people will be, as they already have been, tempted to transfer their capital and machinery for the cultivation of these specialties to Mexico. Permit me to say frankly, if the American people are to be taxed for the protection of sugar in Mexico, and possibly in all the West India Islands as well as Hawaii, it is quite time to think not only about some real protection of American sugar, but of the total release of our own people from all taxes on sugar.

The farmers of our country will have reason to further appreciate the delicate left-handed attention bestowed upon them when they look at the lists of the articles we may export to or import from Mexico under the treaty. It is provided that we may take heniquen bags, if made of Mexican heniquen hemp, free of duty to Mexico "on condition that they be used for subsequent exportation with Mexican products." Such are the painstaking facilities we are actually seeking to bring Mexican barley, wheat, and corn into competition with similar products of the United States.

There is another item to be admitted free by Mexico, to which much importance has been attached—the loud cackle indicating that some biddy had laid an egg—and I hope it may not wholly escape attention, as the advantages claimed may possibly be disputed, namely:

Machines and apparatus of all kinds for industrial, agricultural, and mining purposes, sciences and arts, and any separate extra parts and pieces pertaining thereto.

All textile fabrics are excluded from the treaty, but to machines for their manufacture and to their owners Mexico is to open wide her doors. Practically very little increase of a market for American agricultural machines would be obtained, as even an Indian would be unlikely to buy any other. But the item punctuates the evidence that the great interests of the farmers of the United States have been altogether diligently surrendered. Agricultural machines and apparatus and any separate parts are to be invited and may be exported to Mexico duty free. Thus we have the high privilege of supplying without limit auxiliary forces to largely increase the agricultural products which we are to be bound to receive from Mexico free of duty. Will the American farmer look with composure upon this suddenly and secretly invited border rivalry to which he may be thus exposed, especially after the American reaper and kindred machines go to the ranches of Mexico and enable one man there to do the former work of five? Will he get a better price for his sheep and cattle or his barley and wheat? On the contrary, our commercial prosperity will be much like that of Coleridge's pig, which, while swimming down the river with wind and tide, it will be remembered, cut its own throat.

THE BARGAIN FOR US WRETCHEDLY BAD AND PITIFUL

Having shown, as I believe I have shown, that the farmers and planters, never to be inebriated by reciprocity, are to derive no benefit from this treaty, and that their broad shoulders are to bear the chief part of its burdens—I was almost tempted to say insults—let me show up the sum total of the concessions which Mexico will be called upon to make to anybody and everybody in the United States. All of the duties released to us, based upon our export trade to Mexico in 1883, will be as follows, viz:

Petroleum	$472,045
Carriages	175,000
All other articles included by the treaty	95,306
	742,351
Less 10 to 15 per cent. difference of currency	74,235
Leaving total amount of duties to be remitted	668,116

The whole annual revenue of Mexico is not large, and the surrender by her of even six or seven hundred thousand dollars, as proposed, may be sorely inconvenient; but the statement shows that the chief portion of the duties to be surrendered, $472,045, was collected from petroleum alone, of which they are said to have an abundance, but to lack the enterprise to set it flowing. This American trade the Standard Oil Company would command without any aid from a national treaty, which they are not known to have asked for. We are not called upon to make any sacrifice on their account, and yet petroleum obtains nearly two-thirds of all the concessions granted to the United States. The duties collected by Mexico upon imported carriages amounted to $175,000. No other country than our own has supplied or ever can supply these carriages. The town of Concord, in New Hampshire, furnished stage-coaches for Mexico forty years ago. Indiana, Ohio, and other States are now largely in this line of trade, and their timber and skill assure it to them forever. No increased market for carriages, or for anything else of appreciable importance, will be gained in any region of our country by a bargain so barren of favors as that which is here proposed. Deducting petroleum and carriages from the account of our exports to Mexico, and we have for all other items named in the treaty upon which duties are to be relinquished the insignificant residuum of $95,306; and even this small sum must be whittled down a large percentage on account of the difference of the Mexican silver standard before we arrive at the actual sum total of the practically beneficial concessions promised to us by the treaty. For this paltry sum we are to throw away vastly more than an equivalent, to pinch and imperil extensive farming interests of our own people, risk many national entanglements, and yet its sanguine promoters, ever building "castles in Spain," would have us believe that a feat of magnificent statesmanship was about to be consummated by an international compact of untold comprehensiveness. There is, however, no sentimental statesmanship involved, nothing of carrying our flag, nor of the cross or crozier, as a missionary enterprise, but it is purely a sum in arithmetic, comprehensible by a child in Colburn's "First Lessons." I must be permitted to say, as a bargain it appears to me poor and mischievous, although as a diplomatic achievement we may at least feel consoled that we have not deceived the strong nor oppressed the weak.

The bargain, as a bargain, it will be discovered when carefully studied, fairly matches that of Moses, the son of the Vicar of Wakefield, who, having been intrusted to sell a colt at a fair, returned with the pack of a peddler, and said he had sold the colt for three pounds five shillings and two pence. This his mother thought no bad day's work, and asked to see the money. "I have brought back no money," cried Moses; "I have laid it out in a bargain, and here it is—a gross of green spectacles, with silver rims and shagreen cases." It is needless to say that the "silver rims" of the treaty are likely to turn out no better, or "only copper varnished over." The theory of Mr. Darwin, through which the world has arrived at its existing perfection by the natural selection of the fittest, would seem to be refuted whether applied to the selection of the framers or to the selection of the commodities of reciprocity treaties. But if our tillers of the soil are to suffer, let us ascertain, if we can, to whom, if to anybody, the treaty promises prosperity.

NO OPENING FOR TEXTILE MANUFACTURES, AND NOT MUCH FOR ANYTHING ELSE.

There appears to have been little consideration bestowed by the treaty upon any United States export trade of manufactures, and none whatever upon textile manufactures. Cotton, woolen, silk, and linen manufactures are wholly ignored. Not a yard or thread of any of these is to be invited into Mexico. She retains all this trade to herself. While the widest streams of Mexican agricultural productions are to be allowed to pour in upon our country, only little puling rivulets, floating no great staples of commerce, nothing but the merest shreds and patches, are to go forth from us to Mexico in return. And yet the lofty pretension is made in some quarters that we have a compact which is to open a new and rainbow-tinted era, offering a great outlet for any surplus of our manufactures. Overproduction is to find a daily panacea and be only a memory of the past. But surely all this must be inspired by post-prandial dreams and destitute of any sober foundation. It is true that Mexico engages to receive free of duty a few small articles of iron and steel of a fragmentary and disjointed description, but there is no general or class inclusion of iron or steel, nothing of nails or spikes, nothing of cutlery, nothing of general house-furnishing hardware, and nothing of saddlery hardware, for all of which it might have been supposed there would be possibly some little demand. Instead of this the railroad corporations appear to have secured the foremost consideration, and iron and steel rails, locomotives, cars, and even their hand-trucks are to be admitted into Mexico free of duty. This might all be very nice for railroad repairs, but with the stock of the Mexican Central road down to less than a dozen dollars per share, the further construction of railroads does not seem to indicate "an incarnation of fat dividends," and may not after all be much encouraged. It is, however, more than suspected that the railroad managers had previously obtained Mexican promises for these identical favors, as in fact the same railroad articles under their existing laws appear to be exempt from duties, and therefore would be exempt treaty or no treaty. They, however, serve for padding, of which there is a prodigal expenditure to be found in the proposed treaty. For instance, the free-list for the benefit of the United States formally and ostentatiously embraces seventy-three articles, but of this number fifty-two articles were and are already free of import duties to all the world under the existing tariff laws of Mexico. This would look like a menagerie with its larger part made up of tame cattle.

It is well known, however, that the Mexican state governments, in defiance of the Mexican constitution, levy right and left what are called consumption duties, and if the treaty should have greater restraining force than the national constitution, these duties on treaty articles may be abandoned, but not otherwise.

TOO MUCH PRETENTIOUS PADDING.

The free-list proposed by us for the benefit of Mexico embraces twenty-eight articles, but of these eighteen are now free to all nations under the existing tariff of the United States. Take out the diplomatic padding, and this remarkable treaty at once shrivels up so as to actually cover only twenty-one articles on the one side and but ten on the other. One hundred and one articles are enumerated as the veritable component parts of chief value in this international compact, but the treaty, in sober truth after taking out the nests of empty boxes with nothing in the last box, will only modify or change the existing tariff laws of the contracting parties in relation to thirty-one of all the articles which have been so elaborately designated. Seventy of the articles are of the shoddy description, or free without the treaty, which leaves more than two-thirds of the treaty as bulky pretension, serving no purpose here except to create the false impression that the compact is valuable for all that appears on its face. In this statement I make no account of the nominal Mexican duty already mentioned of about one-fourth or half of a cent per pound applicable to nearly all of their imports.

I can not suppose that any Machiavelian deception has been intended by anybody, and, therefore, I had hoped, but in vain, that some friend of the treaty would move to strike out all of the articles which are now free to everybody under our existing laws, on the ground that it would be more to the honor and dignity of the respective countries, in the solemn terms of a national compact, when they mean nothing, to say nothing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside informally in order that the Senator from Vermont may conclude his remarks. Is there objection? ["No objection."] The Chair hears none. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. Of the twenty-one hop-o'-my-thumb articles (instead of seventy-three) to which Mexico is really to open her ports free of duty to the eager and ambitious trade of the United States, our people will learn with becoming rapture that among them will be found the following hitherto undiscovered and hereafter greatly to be appreciated nine wonders of future commerce, namely: Ice, dynamite, lithographic stones; sausages, great or small; wheelbarrows with one or two wheels, crucibles, faucets, accordions; heniquen bags, on condition that they be used for subsequent exportation of Mexican products.

As Beau Brummel said of his Dresden china, these articles "are almost too fine to be looked at." The marvel is that some other equally important and kindred staples, found only in the milky-way of reciprocity, should have been overlooked, or that tripe, corkscrews, spigots, bootjacks, and hurdy-gurdies were not also included to complete the grandiose collocation. It seems that "motley is the only wear." Let me repeat from the original text of the treaty this part of the exquisite list of the goods which are to revolutionize international trade: Ice, dynamite, lithographic stones, sausages, wheelbarrows, crucibles, faucets, accordions, and heniquen bags! Practically this congenial group embraces about one-half of all the articles upon which concessions are actually to be made by Mexico. What temptations are here disclosed, not to daze mankind in a museum of unique curiosities, but to laden argosies and continental railroads in new fields of commerce! Was ever a puissant nation in this humor wooed? Was ever any nation in this humor wed? If we must have reciprocity it appears to me that it should not be of this unfortunate and beggarly description, but something more worthy of our great Republic. If anybody has indulged the idle fancy that we are about to enrich and aggrandize our country by supplanting other nations in Mexican trade while leading off with such low commercial trumps as wheelbarrows with one or two wheels, or with sausages large or small, it may as well be dismissed as a delusion and a snare.

THE SUBSIDIZED RAILROADS LIKELY TO BREED NOTHING BUT NATIONAL CONFLICTS.

But it is said that the lately authorized railroads in Mexico will effect a revolution in the industrial character of the people, as well as in the variety and magnitude of their productions; but this is no more likely to occur than that health in the tierra caliente will become contagious. We are treated with too many prophecies in the air, which are most likely to be verified when the back of the man in the moon becomes visible, but not till then.

Marvelous claims are put forth on the ground that some of these railroad companies have been able to hire native laborers to help build their roads. In a country where labor has been accustomed to the slenderest compensation it would be strange if a few thousand workmen could not be obtained when new and extraordinary inducements were offered. When these works suspend, and some have already suspended, the temporary employment of the few thousand native laborers will cease, and with the disappearance of the prosperity arising from the lavish expenditure of foreign capital they will be relegated to their former complacent condition of idleness, indigence, and ignorance.

If the recent extensive system of lavishly subsidized railroads in Mexico had been adventured upon by a nation abounding in wealth and in gilt-edged credit from its debt-paying reputation, it would still be a doubtful experiment. Reliable support of railroads must chiefly be found in the thrift upon their borders. The lubricity of Mexican subventions will not last forever. Already the axles begin to creak.

I would by no means becloud the fortunes of those who have been, fortunately or unfortunately, induced to invest their money in Mexican ventures; but practical facts must control the actions of sober legislators, who ought not to be dazed by the tropical luxuriance of predictions concerning future possibilities. There is, perhaps, something too much of railroads in the warp and woof of the proposed treaty. After summarily forfeiting several prior charters, Mexico recently chartered railroads aggregating in length 17,194 miles, which, when completed and equipped, can not cost less than about $500,000,000. From whence is this magnificent capital all to be drawn? Not certainly from London or Paris, and the condition of not a few of our own dividendless railroad investments at home is not so brilliant as to attract further American contributions to enterprises abroad, where success would be much more problematical. A railroad halt here will not be the signal for an onward march elsewhere, even in Utopia.

Whether the success of our treaty depends upon the success of the railroads, or the success of the railroads upon the success of the treaty, is a complicated question, with which I do not propose to vex either myself or others by any discussion.

It is not possible that a large commerce shall spring up as by magic where there is comparatively none now, and where the people are too few in number and too poor to encourage its growth. I would gladly see the wealth, intelligence, and civilization of Mexico and the stability of its government advance to a higher plane, but I do not think we shall aid her by inducing outsiders to revive the age of feudal proprietors upon all her large vacant estates, nor shall we aid her by sending restless adventurers there solely to gratify their greed for gain; and I am quite sure such a line of policy would not result to our advantage, but much to our disadvantage should it stimulate our hereditary Anglo-Saxon greed for the acquisition of all adjacent territory.

THE CLOUDY SIDE OF THE SILVER QUESTION.

Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the silver side of the Mexican treaty. In our country we are hoarding for the most part our entire production of silver. We do not allow it to go out of the country as an article of merchandise, but with monthly precision and stolid endurance pile it away by millions and by tons in the painfully overloaded vaults of the Treasury, and restrict our exports accordingly to the same extent. Therefore the stipulation in the Mexican treaty that we may export to Mexico the precious metals or the legal money of silver and gold is as nugatory as it would be to grant the privilege of walking to a man whose legs were tied up in a bag. Our silver is tied up at home. The eccentricity of this provision, as an example of "carrying coal to Newcastle," challenges further attention when we remember that the track of silver ever has been and ever must be all the other way; that is to say, that the silver mines of Mexico are nearly as prolific as our own, and only a small part of their domestic product has ever been or ever can be absorbed at home.

Our entire imports from Mexico for 1883 were $17,960,109, and of this more than half, or $9,782,986, was in silver coin and bullion, which in 1884 was increased to $13,015,901. This was a large part of the annual production of silver in Mexico, where it is now very properly held to be sound policy to treat silver as one of the chief commodities they produce to sell. Mexican silver does and will come here—as overstocked as our market is likely to be—to compete with the silver produced from the mines of the United States. We have no laws, and nowhere but in Colorado is it proposed to have any, that will prevent this influx. It is the only commodity of which Mexico now produces a surplus with which to settle her yearly balance of trade with us. A demand, therefore, for our silver in Mexico may be looked for when more brimstone is called for in the realms of Pluto, but at no earlier date.

When this treaty shall be consummated there is little doubt that for the first time in our history some emigration will take place from the United States to a foreign country. It may be found more profitable to produce sugar and tobacco, hemp and beef in Mexico for our markets than in the United States, stimulated as all will be not only by cheaper land and cheaper labor, but by the large and special bounties offered by us through the relinquishment of our present duties.

Richer mines of the precious metals also may perhaps be found there than even in Nevada and Colorado. Adventurers will attempt the sudden acquirement of fortunes; and the silver mines of Mexico, glittering in history as well as in fable, will attract more or less the capital and the miners of the United States. From the application of greater numbers, with greater skill and better machinery, we may reasonably anticipate a much larger importation of silver from Mexico. If this were to be brought about without a drain upon our own people and our own capital, it would not be, perhaps, altogether objectionable, as all the silver received from Mexico will be received at its cash or bullion value. It might possibly interfere as an unwelcome and vigorous competitor with the profits of our own mines, and, if it should, some further depression in the commercial value of silver could hardly be escaped. That must be determined hereafter. But for myself I should much prefer to encourage our own mines and miners than to transfer either Americans or their capital to Mexico. If we are to have a deluge of silver, let it come from our own fountains and inure to the benefit of our own citizens and of those intending so to remain.

ALL EXPERIENCE ADVERSE TO RECIPROCITY.

The experience of our country should serve as an all-sufficient warning against so-called reciprocity treaties, with the reciprocity somehow always obtusely left out. The fault is not wholly to be imputed to the negotiators, but largely to the inherent impossibility of reciprocity, and yet, if such treaties are to be our daily food in the new and more resplendent coming era, as foretold, it might be well to provide a corps of profoundly trained diplomatists, equal to the "college of heralds and embassadors" of ancient Rome, or at least to have such as had learned some of the mysteries of commerce, some of the great highways of trade, some of the existing revenue laws, and also, in the solemn badinage of Sir Robert Peel to his friends when going to Paris—

They must understand the lingo,
Or they'll get cheated by jingo.

Our reciprocity treaty with the Canadas was so notoriously unequal and jug-handled that we have been offered large additional favors as temptations to a renewal. Our later arrangement as to reciprocity in the fisheries, with its hidden statistical frauds, was not one calculated to make us vain of American diplomacy. The preponderance of the favors granted by us beyond all doubt was worth millions, and yet we paid to the Canadas a bonus of millions to secure their acceptance. Our reciprocity treaty with His Hawaiian Majesty—a king with more alien Johnny Newcomes and coolies than subjects—is now maintained at a positive annual loss of nearly $4,000,000 of revenue on the sugar and rice duties remitted, and without any computable benefit to anybody, unless the benefits to Mr. Spreckels are computable, and computable not for any reduction in the price of sugar and rice on the Pacific coast and not because the kingdom of Kalakaua offers a market for American products, but for the reason that Mr. Spreckels, the sugared autocrat, and his sweet associates are the recipients of unearned millions annually, and hold His Majesty sandwiched in the hollow of their hands, flattering him with the éclat of a coronation and a triumphal airing in the royal courts of Europe, or curbing him with the suave mastery of a premier at their own sweet will and pleasure. In six years we have relinquished $13,717,436 of duties upon sugar and rice alone, while the gross value of all merchandise exported to the islands during the same time was only $13,033,314. This is the mountain of political ascendency bringing forth a mouse at Hawaii, supported by reciprocity, and all that has yet appeared of what is called "American influence," and we flatter ourselves with having American ascendency in the Pacific Ocean, but it is an ascendency incapable of withstanding the slightest aggression, exposed to the chances of sudden wars as well as of treacherous bribery, and which a modern gunboat, or a few Old World guineas, might extinguish in forty minutes.

The treaty we have had under consideration is of the same class of those mentioned, and will be found no less at war with our material interests. That is to say, it will be found that our concessions will ultimately be large and important, while those of Mexico, made up of trivialities, are wholly destitute of substance or of reciprocity. If the Senate had reached the conclusion to have a treaty with Mexico, then, as it seemed to me, it should have been carefully and decently amended, the "unlicked cub" should have been put in better shape by the Senate, so that when we go home to our respective States we might defend ourselves from the imputation of having hastily and unwisely consented to a compact with the unequal and peculiarly obnoxious conditions now presented. By its terms the compact can not take effect until the prescribed tariff shall have been enacted by Congress. Our only chance of escape with honor from the unfit and onerous compact will be to postpone indefinitely any tariff for Mexico only.

THE FREE ZONE, AS NOW EXTENDED, FATAL TO ALL TRADE SAVE THAT OF SMUGGLERS.

The former condition of the Zona Libre permitted all foreign dutiable merchandise to be imported into Matamoras, Reynosa, Camargo, Mier, Guerrero, and Nueva Laredo, in the State of Tamaulipas, free of all duties, except the nominal one of one-fourth or one-half cent per pound and 1.37 per cent. of the regular Mexican tariff on all imports. The goods thus imported were to be consumed in these towns, or transported to any other towns inside of the Zona Libre, and there consumed free of duties. This free zone was originally established by a decree of an ad interim governor of the then defiant, if not semi-disloyal, State of Tamaulipas, in order to build up, as it has built up, her border towns in competition with American towns, and it has succeeded in gathering a reckless population of flourishing and desperate smugglers, who are as eager for the business of illicit trade in domestic as in foreign merchandise, one way as the other, or as ready to defraud the Government of Mexico as that of the United States.

The trade through this free zone is largely supported by importations from Europe. While it exists it must heavily countermine the supposed advantages of any so-called reciprocity treaty. How are we to prosper, though having a free entrance at the front door of Mexico for a limited number of unimportant articles of American production, while back doors of Sodom and Gomorrah, as these free towns have been called, are left wide open and free for the universal admission of foreign productions of all descriptions? Some assurances were given that the national government of Mexico would soon be able and willing to abolish this very anomalous Zona Libre. If any such intention really existed, why was it not secured and riveted by some proper provision of the treaty? With such an ominous and overwhelming outlet and inlet, extending hundreds of miles along the boundary line, where smuggling is life's gamy business, opening a career to both sexes more remunerative than any other, the treaty could not be expected to hold even water except by a miracle, certainly not to hold anything of solid substance.

Rats have been said to mark the progress of civilization by keeping pace with the progress of railroads, and the free zone, no less enterprising, appears to follow the railroad progress of civilization in Mexico by an extension north to and beyond Paso del Norte. Looking, as we were taught to look, for the suppression of this licensed invasion of their constitutional laws, we discover instead its broad extension by a further national legislative act, passed since the date of the treaty, and of which the Senate certainly had no timely information.

It now appears that goods exempt from duty may be sold for consumption "to supply the towns of all that frontier line," from Matamoras to Pas del Norte, Nogales, and "as far as the limit of the respective municipal jurisdictions toward the interior of the country." After this how much will our treaty-bought privileges be worth? If reciprocity trade would have had much to encounter from the prior extent of the free zone, it will have much more to encounter from this recent almost boundless expansion, with the possibility that the end is not yet reached. Our entertainment will be much like that prepared by the fox for the stork, and foxy Mexico, seeing that we partake so sparingly, may express sarcastic regrets "that the dish was not seasoned more to our taste."

The initiation of tariff bills, in whole or in part, or the ingenious legerdemain of substitutes, sent here in the shape of reciprocity treaties by the executive department of the Government, is not only an encroachment upon the privileges of the other House of Congress—breaking the very heart-strings of the Constitution—but contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government, wholly unrepublican, and only in harmony with empires and monarchies where the executive originates and monopolizes the introduction of all the leading legislative measures. A reciprocity treaty, wholly unknown to our fathers, is a modern invention, which, like the Trojan horse, hides in its belly all of its sinister and miscreated forces, including its insidious and ravenous absorption of revenue. This recently developed executive power I greatly fear threatens to increase, and not only ought to be diminished but wholly and forever inexorably denied. Should this power, unfortunately, be triumphant, so much of our revenue will be sacrificed as to require the early and prompt creation of new sources of revenue. I am unwilling to collect any revenue from our people for the sole purpose of giving it away to foreigners through reciprocity treaties.

I am willing to confess that I am not without some apprehension that future border difficulties may be engendered by measures of so-called reciprocity. Three-fourths of all wars arise directly or indirectly from the eagerness of foreign trade, its frictions, accidents, and complications. Investments of American capital in Mexico will give rise to conflicts of interest, to strife between the herdsmen of Abram's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle, and possibly to some flagrant wrong or violation of compacts, which even an unstable and revolutionary people must be called upon to atone, and which diplomacy may find no way to adjust except through a further transfer to us of territory. With the territory would come its miscellaneous tribes of inhabitants. Our own territory is now well rounded out, needing nothing for a scientific boundary, needing nothing for its symmetry, prosperity, or convenience, and we need no such inauspicious augmentation of our population as would follow. Little political confidence can be reposed in the transplanted Latin race, still less in the Indian race and its hybrids, for the maintenance of liberty, law, and republican institutions of government. We are already sufficiently weighted. Let us say to Mexico, "We will go this way and you may go that way, and we will live in perpetual peace and friendship, for we are republican brethren."

CONCLUSION: THAT ANY TARIFF FOR MEXICO ONLY SHOULD BE REJECTED.

I shall be constrained to oppose any legislative action required to carry the treaty into effect, first, because, as it appears to me, it is incurably wrong, a downright and flagrant invasion of the rights of Congress, and of the House of Representatives, to them exclusively granted by the Constitution.

Second, because a fair interpretation of the "most favored nation" clause in all of our treaty compacts forbids it, and controversies on this point, which must strain our relations with all friendly nations, should be carefully avoided.

Third, because the whole boundary line of the State of Tamaulipas on our border has long been and is now a Zona Libre, where merchandise from all foreign countries is admitted duty free, and the national government of Mexico seems to have neither the power nor will to prevent it, but since the date of the signatures to the treaty has authorized by law its very large northerly extension.

Fourth, because the treaty, if now made operative, will impose an unlooked-for burden upon farmers and planters, bringing the whole territory of Mexico into direct and untaxed competition with our own people, and that without any sufficient reciprocal or adequate compensation.

Fifth, because we have no opening presented for the export of any class of our productions, except in homeopathic prescriptions of no respectable magnitude and destitute of all national importance.

Sixth, because it would be likely at an early day to transfer the base of an incomputable share of cattle-raising, and of sugar, tobacco, and other important American industries, to a foreign land.

Seventh, because it would show Mexico to be the goal to-day from which we might start next week for South America, and the week after for Canada and the rest of mankind; and would also show that we are willing and eager to accept as a precedent for the future the far-reaching innovation of reciprocity treaties, though of the smallest merit and however undeserving acceptance.

Eighth, because it may hereafter contribute the materials for a Gordian knot, only to be cut by the acquisition of territory we do not need, and of inhabitants we do not want, as they seem better schooled to local revolutions than to the government of a republic.

Ninth, because such treaties are unrepublican in their origin and character, having been sternly and unanimously rejected by the earlier statesmen of our country, and because they obviously tend largely to the increase of the executive power by making Congress the obedient registers of its will.

I ask that the resolution may lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The resolution will lie upon the table, if there be no objection?

Mr. LAPHAM. I give notice that I shall ask to continue this discussion after the close of the routine business to-morrow morning by offering some remarks upon that portion of the President's message which relates to commercial treaties.

LIGHT-HOUSES AND FOG-SIGNALS ON NARRAGANSET BAY.

Mr. SHEFFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate, without unnecessary delay, whether there exists a public necessity for the construction and maintenance of additional light-houses and fog-signals in order to afford proper facilities for the navigation and shipping employed on the waters of Narraganset Bay; and, if so, what light-houses and fog-signals are needed for that purpose; at what places should they be located, and what would be the probable cost thereof; and if any report in reference thereto is in his Department from the Light-House Board, that he communicate a copy thereof to the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 32) providing for the payment of laborers in Government employ for certain holidays.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CULLOM to add, at the end of section 11, the following:

And said commission shall accompany its first report with a bill presenting a just and comprehensive code for the regulation of the transportation of commerce among the States, which said bill shall embrace provisions for establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water-routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation and in the preparation of said bill, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment which was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and which was withdrawn by him with the understanding that I should reoffer it, is now before the Senate as the first amendment to be considered. I have no remarks to make upon it. I suppose the Senator from Iowa wishes to be heard.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate on the amendment further than to say that its purpose is to impose a duty upon the commission, should the pending bill become a law, to pursue certain lines of investigation, and to report to the Secretary of the Interior in time for Congress to have the benefit of their findings by the commencement of the first session of the next Congress. There is nothing in the amendment which commits any person to any line of policy. It merely directs the investigation, with the results to be presented, accompanied by a bill in which shall be formulated the principles involved in the investigation directed.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator from Iowa, if he has his amendment before him, whether he would be willing to strike out, in line 5, the words "both maximum and minimum," and leave the rest of the amendment stand? I think the Senator will find that there will be serious opposition to the amendment with those words in. With them out, so far as I am personally concerned, while I have not the authority to speak for the committee, I would not object to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. As I have just said, the amendment commits no one to the policy of establishing a system of maximum and minimum rates. It simply directs the commission to pursue that as one of the lines directed in the investigation; and we are to get the results of the investigation concerning that feature of the amendment the same as the others embraced within its terms.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me I will state one objection that I think I see in the amendment. If I were an advocate of a law which should establish maximum and minimum rates of transportation, I should not want to submit the framing of such a law to a commission that might be opposed to it. The commission is to report upon this question. Suppose after a full examination of the whole subject they should be unanimously of the opinion that an attempt to establish by law maximum and minimum rates for transportation was altogether unwise and not feasible? Now, to lay the duty upon a commission holding such an opinion as that to frame a bill which should establish maximum and minimum rates I think would be illogical. I would rather frame it myself if I were in favor of it. Therefore I think if the Senator will get the facts and let the proper committee frame the bill, if one is to be framed, when the time comes, he will accomplish all that ought to be done.

Mr. WILSON. I should prefer to have the commission, which we direct to pursue this investigation upon certain lines, to give us a bill in accordance with the results of their investigation. Nobody is bound by their finding. It merely gives a result.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is mistaken. He does not require them to give a bill which may be conformable to the results they have reached at all, but he compels them to present a bill establishing a system of maximum and minimum rates, even if their opinion is clear against it.

Mr. WILSON. That can be of no disadvantage. We shall at all events get the best thought of that commission on this subject, and it is one of the most interesting features in the entire range of the investigation. If we can arrive at their best judgment as represented in the provisions of such a bill as they may present under the operation of this amendment it will certainly aid us; at least it can do no harm.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that the bill already calls for full information on this subject and for such recommendations as these commissioners after the experience of a year may feel willing to make to the Congress of the United States. Now, I am willing that the scope of that investigation shall be just as broad as possible, that it shall embrace this business of transportation in every detail, and that the facilities for making the investigation thorough shall be most ample; access shall be given to all the books and papers of every railroad company; but I doubt the wisdom of requiring that commission to report a bill with the limitations that are proposed in this amendment. They are not left free to report such a bill as they think ought to be submitted to Congress, as the Tariff Commission was, but they are required to report a bill which shall contain certain features, even though the commission should be unanimously of the opinion that Congress ought not to pass a bill containing any such features at all. It would come to us, and it would be said, "Here is the bill presented by the railroad commission." It would be known as "the railroad commission bill;" and yet it might be a bill that did not have the approval of a single member of that commission. As I have said, if I believed in a system of maximum and minimum charges by law I should want to commit the framing of that bill to some committee or some commission that agreed with me, not to a committee or commission that did not believe in establishing maximum and minimum rates. Therefore I think the Senator is wrong in principle when he requires them to report a bill containing a schedule of maximum and minimum rates. Suppose the commission should say, "We can not do it; it ought not to be done at all;" yet they are under the compulsion of this amendment to present such a bill and let it come before us as the commission bill.

This amendment says:

And said commission shall accompany its first report with a bill presenting a just and comprehensive code for the regulation of the transportation of commerce among the States—

That gives them discretion to frame it according to their wise view of what is proper, but it is added—which said bill shall embrace provisions for establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation.

It does not leave anything to their discretion. They are compelled to include in that bill such a system, and it would seem by reporting it that they gave it some sanction.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator suppose that the imposition of this duty upon the commission will prevent them from pursuing any other line of investigation or giving us any other results no matter how different they may be from the provisions of this amendment? Not at all. My purpose is to compel an investigation upon certain lines which will result in the formulation of a bill such as is described by the amendment; and the commission may go as widely over the field as they please. They may report a bill in accordance with the duty imposed by the terms of the law if the amendment shall be adopted, and report any other number of accompanying bills, and give us their best judgment. But I desire to have a definite investigation of the very difficult subject involved in the question of a system of maximum and minimum rates. If upon that investigation it shall appear that that is impracticable, all well. The mere fact that they are required to formulate the results of their inquiries in a bill will not detract from the effectiveness or value of the investigation and the consequent report.

Mr. HARRISON. Why, Mr. President, as I have said to the Senator from Iowa, I agree that this investigation ought to be without limit. I say it seems to me that it is absolutely without precedent to lay upon a commission that is charged with the duty of investigation a requirement that they shall report a particular measure. The Senator does not leave this open to their investigation. He concludes it now by this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. He says, "You shall report to us a bill fixing maximum and minimum rates, whatever your view may be, although the information that you bring us and the experience and observation of the year may satisfy every one of you that there ought to be no such bill, but even if you think so you have got to frame one."

Mr. WILSON. But at the same time they may accompany it with any recommendation or any number of bills they please touching the subject.

Mr HARRISON. Then, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, the difficulty would be obviated by inserting "if they shall see fit," or "if they shall believe they ought to report such a measure." That meets my point. Otherwise suppose their report comes in and they say it is utterly impracticable, that it would demoralize transportation?

Mr. WILSON. The answer to that is, that the commission never will come in with such a statement as that without having investigated the subject, and unless you impose the duty of that investigation upon them they may not pursue that branch of the subject at all.

Mr. HARRISON. I have said repeatedly that I want the investigation to be as wide as possible. The Senator from Iowa can have no controversy with me on that. He may make it as broad as he pleases; I want it to be broad; but the point of my objection is that we shall require them upon a specific point involved in this investigation to report a bill of a certain kind absolutely, divesting them of all discretion in framing their bill. If they should be of opinion that this ought not to be in the bill, they are obliged to come in here and here is the commission bill containing a system of maximum and minimum rates and charges reported to us.

Mr. WILSON. That would be the bill which they would report under the limitations of this amendment; but if their judgment should be against the practicability of such a measure, they can report also another bill or any number of bills. This limitation merely holds them to an investigation of the subject, the results of which shall be given us in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. If that is so, why will not the Senator consent to an amendment that shall require them to investigate and report the result, instead of compelling them to report a bill with this feature in it?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, for the purpose of enabling the Senate to understand what the bill itself contains on the subject of investigation and reports to the Congress, I will read the section originally in the bill, and which is in the bill now, requiring a report from the commission:

SEC. 11. That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day in December in each year, make a report to the Secretary of the Interior, which shall be by him transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports issued from the Interior Department. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of interstate commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation for the regulation of interstate commerce as the commission may deem necessary.

That is the section reported by the committee in reference to the report of the commission. On the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] an amendment was adopted a day or two ago to section 2 which requires the commission "to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to commerce between the States, and especially in the matter of the transportation thereof, so far as may be necessary to the establishment of a just system of regulations for the government of the same."

That provision which I have just read has been added to the bill as a part of section 2. Now the Senator from Iowa offers his amendment, which has been explained by the Senator, and much of which to my mind is proper, and I have no objection to very much of it. In fact, I would vote for any of it personally if the words "both maximum and minimum" were stricken out. It leaves the amendment after that with the duty imposed upon the commission to make investigation, and to report a bill which "shall embrace provisions for establishing a system of charges for transportation and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities," &c.

So far as I am personally concerned I should be inclined to support the amendment with those two or three words out of it. I hope the Senator from Iowa will eliminate those words, so that the vote upon the rest of the amendment may be taken.

Mr. WILSON. I do not feel willing to eliminate the words mentioned by the Senator from Illinois. If the Senate, however, choose to amend the proposition by voting those words out, of course I can not help it. There will be enough of the amendment left to induce me to support it after the elimination; but I prefer not to consent to the words being stricken out. If it is done by the vote of the Senate, of course I can not avoid it.

Mr. CULLOM. If it be in order, I move to strike out in line 5, of the amendment, the words "both maximum and minimum."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CULLOM. My motion is to strike out of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, though it appears as offered by myself, the words in line 5, "both maximum and minimum."

Mr. McPHERSON. I have in my hand an "amendment intended to be proposed" by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and I find those words on the second page, in line 9.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will allow me to explain. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa was temporarily withdrawn with the understanding with the Senator from Illinois that he would reoffer it, and as it stands now it is an amendment purporting to be offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. The words I speak of are in line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now pending is the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but really is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Modified.

Mr. CULLOM. Substantially the same amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair made a mistake in referring to it as the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as it was simply the understanding that it was his. It is offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from Illinois, to the effect of this amendment which he proposes. It seems to me it leaves the original amendment in a more objectionable shape than it was before; for whereas the amendment provided that the system of charges reported should be maximum and minimum, the amendment with those words stricken out will read:

Which said bill shall embrace provisions for establishing a system of charges for transportation.

Instead of fixing outside and inside rates of charges they would be required to make a schedule, if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is adopted and then the original amendment is adopted. I do not want to repeat what I have said, but this whole amendment simply directs the commission to report a bill which shall contain certain things, not only the one to which I have referred, but they shall report a bill "for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points."

They must frame a bill by which the same rate of charges would be established between non-competing as competing points. In other words, while it may be that the Senator from Iowa is right, and the bill which we shall adopt when this report comes in should contain every one of these things, what I object to is establishing a commission for the investigation of certain questions, and then foreclosing that commission in advance by directing them to report a bill which shall contain certain things.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the only reason why I vote for the amendment with those words out is that the remainder of the amendment is of a general character, and as I think will enable the commission appointed to report just such a bill as they think is necessary in the premises. But with those words in they would be compelled to report a bill fixing maximum and minimum rates, and I do not feel ready to commit myself to that proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Illinois whether as he leaves the amendment they will not have to report a schedule of charges?

Mr. CULLOM. As the amendment would be left with those words out, the bill would necessarily have to embrace "provisions for establishing a system of charges for transportation and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same shall be competing or non-competing points."

Mr. SEWELL. Let me suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he also strike out "charges for transportation and," so as to read:

And which said bill shall embrace provisions for establishing a system for the preservation of free competition, &c.

The fixing of a rate by Congress in view of the facts I presented a few days ago showing that the cost of railroad transportation runs from less than half a cent per ton a mile to 20 cents per ton a mile on some railroads seems to be perfectly absurd. We can not fix a rate to cover all; it is a physical impossibility unless you choose to wipe out some corporations. That is a matter which must be left to the good sense of the commission absolutely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, before any further elaboration of these propositions is made by the Senate, I would venture to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois, in view of the fact that the matter touched by these bills and the amendments is one of the most important under any sense of the word that we can consider, and especially as it embarks for the first time upon a very great question of constitutional power in the regulation of commerce between the States. It is perfectly well understood that all the agencies of interstate commerce, all the agencies of transportation except the natural highways of water, are the creation of State charters and State incorporations. I am not here for a moment to deny, but on the contrary rather to affirm, the great necessity for some regularity of proceeding for the citizens of this country in regard to their intercommunication; nor am I here to seek at all to restrict the concession of power to the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce between the States. I am disposed to believe that the most intelligent and able of those minds now concerned in the business of transportation of merchandise and passengers between the States of this Union are to-day themselves as much as any impressed with the necessity of something like uniformity in the regulation of their business. But, sir, just in proportion to the gravity of this power and its importance, so is the necessity for a deliberate approach to the execution of the authority confided to us.

It is not a violation of the rules of this body to refer not to the debates or to the action of the co-ordinate branch of Congress, but to the fact that before the House of Representatives measures touching this same question are now pending, and if not approaching a finality of consideration are certainly under consideration, and that we may reasonably expect propositions in one form or another relating to this same great business to come to us in the course of a few days. Now it is obvious that there is not only a waste of time, but there is something more—the danger of the conflict of the pride of opinion between the two Houses that may lead to a disagreement in the event of our pursuing this great subject by separate paths at the same time. The regular course of legislation is for the origination of a bill in one or the other House of Congress, and after it has been matured as well as that body may see fit and has passed, then to submit the result of their opinions to the co-ordinate branch in order that there may be reached the great finality, concurrence of judgment between the two Houses upon any public question.

Now, therefore, as it is well known as a public fact, and known to us individually and known to us as members of this body, that the whole of this question is to-day, and even as I speak to-day, under debate at the other end of this Capitol building, I submit to the honorable Senator having charge of this measure whether it is not eminently wise and proper to delay the consideration of this class of measures until we have the outcome of the consultations and judgment of the House. I can well understand that if Senators shall take a stand so to speak, if there shall be here expressions of opinion positively made in advance of the action of the House, gentlemen may be unwilling perhaps to retire from such expressions; and that is unfavorable to that community of thought and community of action which is essential for legislation.

I will also say for myself that I do desire longer time and more knowledge than I now possess, before passing on questions of such far-reaching magnitude. Whether or not we may throw the action of the two Houses under the consideration of the judicial branch, to have questions put to us as to whether our action has been within the warrant of our powers, is something that I would greatly rather avoid. I never desire to vote upon a question of doubtful constitutionality. I think the affirmative and the affirmative proof is always upon Congress to show that they have the power to do that which they attempt to do or propose to do, and not that they shall legislate in doubtful premises. Therefore it is that I hope, quite irrespective of the merit or demerit of the amendment now proposed, that the entire question may be allowed to rest here until we shall have learned something more determinate of the action of the other House, which is just as essential for the practical enactment of any measure as our own, before we proceed on parallel lines with them—parallel lines that may never touch—in debating questions which simply occupy time without bearing fruit in practical results.

I know very well that the questions embraced in these bills have engaged the attention of my honorable friend from Illinois, and in regard to which we have heard from him from time to time are of enormous importance, important to every branch of American industry, important to individuals, important to communities, important to those vast aggregations of power and capital called incorporations; but just in the same measure that I perceive their importance so do I view the necessity of our being very guarded here in our action upon them.

I hope therefore the Senator will allow this measure and its amendments, as it now stands before the Senate, to be laid aside, not waiving any right of priority which it may have attained by being now taken up. I make the suggestion, not with a desire to avoid it or postpone it unduly; but the whole class of measures, the claim of power, the extent to which that power shall be exercised, are questions that require close scrutiny, for we have no legislative precedents upon the subject. Plain as may be the declaration of the power in Congress, it is certainly true that Congress has never up to this period in American history assumed to exercise the power. The power to regulate commerce is of itself one of ascertained judicial definition, and it is a very serious question how far the Congress of the United States may interpolate new conditions in the contracts formed by corporations or by individuals with the several States under the authority of law.

I hope, therefore, that this measure will not be further considered at this time. I submit to the honorable Senator having it in charge that we are, as I said before, moving upon parallel lines with the other House. That is not a proper method of legislation, because it is intended that the minds of the two Houses should go together, and for that purpose it is proper to have the determination of one before the other assumes to criticise or act upon it. I desire to see and I expect to see in the rational course of events measures relating to this great subject passed by the other House and laid before the Senate. In that case we can consider what has been done, we can amend it according to the discretion of the Senate; but I submit respectfully to my friend from Illinois that his independent measure debated now, voted upon now, will rather tend to keep the action of the two Houses asunder and destroy that uniformity which is necessary for the purpose of enacting any law. That end is not reached by our acting separately and without regard to what is being done elsewhere.

Mr. CULLOM. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Delaware, I desire to say that this bill has been before the Senate now for many months. When I came into the Senate more than a year ago I was impressed with the feeling and belief that something should be done upon this very important question, and having been placed by the Senate upon the Committee on Railroads I gave it some attention. I prepared a bill, introduced it in the Senate; it was referred to the committee, amended and reported back by the committee to the Senate during the last session of Congress, and it has been upon the Calendar ever since.

So far as I am concerned I am not able to see any reason why the Senate should suspend the consideration of this very important subject because, forsooth, the other branch of Congress is considering the same subject. If the Senator is not aware I will inform him that that body has been considering this subject, as I understand, with the distinguished member of the House who now has charge of it there, about ten years. They have had all kinds of bills before them; they have been voted down; they have been debating them from session to session, and, as I am informed by the Senator, they are doing so now.

If it has come to be that the Senate of the United States, when it finds that the House is considering a subject, must lay it aside until the expression of the House is sent over to us in the shape of a bill, there are a good many other questions that we might lay aside just as well. I do not suppose that any man, either here or in the other House, knows what the action of the House is going to be on this subject. They have been debating it, as has been said, for a long time; there is a diversity of opinion upon the question; and it does seem to me if there is that importance attached to it that the Senator himself says there is, and that I believe every Senator regards as being attached to the subject, it is our duty to prosecute the question until we come to some conclusion about it.

There are before the Senate amendments to the bill covering, as I understand, the bill that is now under discussion in the other House, as well as other substitutes and amendments. The probability is that if the House is going to pass a bill at this session, it will have passed it and it will come into the Senate before the Senate concludes the discussion and consideration of the question. But I do not feel myself that there is one Senator upon this floor who would be doing right by the Senate or right by the people of the United States if he were to postpone the consideration of the question, important as it is, to await the action of the House of Representatives.

It seems to me that it is my duty and the duty of the Senate, now that the subject is before us, to proceed with the consideration of the bill. If in the mean time, before our consideration of the question is concluded, the House of Representatives should pass a bill upon the subject and it should come before us, there will be time then to determine whether that bill shall be substituted for the bill now before the Senate for consideration, or what shall be done with it; but I think we ought to go forward with the consideration of the bill that is now before us.

I am very sorry that my distinguished friend the Senator from Delaware does not feel himself thoroughly acquainted with the question. I think his expression upon that subject is more the result of his own modesty than a statement of a fact. I think when we get into the consideration of it the Senator will know as much about it as any other man upon this floor.

I hope the Senator will allow the discussion to go forward, that he will allow the consideration of the bill now before the Senate to proceed, and in the mean time, while it is being considered, the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] will come before the Senate for consideration, which, I understand, is the exact bill that is under consideration by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course the practical object of either House of Congress is not only that a bill may pass its own consideration and obtain a majority, but in such form as to procure concurrence in the other branch. The assent of both Houses is essential. Therefore it is a practical course of legislation so to arrange the consideration and presentation of measures as to procure that which is essential for all laws, the concurrence of the co-ordinate body.

My friend says that for ten years the House of Representatives has been considering this question. So in some degree has the Senate. Certain it is that no measure as yet has been sufficiently matured to meet the independent judgment of either body, for as I am informed no bill upon this subject has ever passed either House of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed by some Senators here that the statement of the Senator that no such bill has ever passed either branch is a mistake. One was heretofore passed by the House of Representatives, I understand.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, without considering its merits, I understand that a bill did pass the House a few years ago; but certain it is it did not meet the concurrence of the Senate; it never became a law, and we are as far off as we were originally.

My desire is that the minds of the two Houses shall come together upon this important subject. The question is how that shall be facilitated, and I certainly do not think that it is to be facilitated either in point of value or in point of time by proceeding upon parallel lines, which, as I said before, will never touch.

The commerce of the United States may be generically divided into exterior foreign commerce and interstate domestic commerce. Of the two we are told by high statistical authority that our internal commerce, the bargain and sale and contract among our own people and at home, outnumbers many times the whole of our foreign transactions and exchanges. I do not know how many times more. I have heard it estimated at twenty times as much. I believe that amount has been somewhat by guesswork, reduced to ten times; but certain is it that the bulk of American interests affected by interstate commerce far exceeds many times over the whole body of our exterior commerce with foreign nations.

Now, what is proposed by the Senate bill? Without going into particulars or details, it is proposed that the whole of a commerce five, six, eight, ten times as great as our foreign commerce, shall be submitted to the control of a commission of five men. Certain it is that if such a proposition had ever been made in regard to the foreign commerce of the United States it scarcely would have received respectful attention. We have had a body of commercial regulations, formed of necessity and instructed by experience following since the foundation of the Government. The body of our commercial regulations with foreign nations is very vast and complicated, much of it useless perhaps, a great deal obstructive; and nevertheless it has been a great growth, running through all the generations that have here lived since the foundation of the Government. Suppose it were now proposed to substitute for that great body of law, good, bad, and indifferent as it may be, the regulation of a commission under some such act as we find here to-day, would it receive a single vote in this Chamber? I apprehend not. And yet it is proposed to submit interests tenfold as great as the foreign commerce of the United States to the control of a single commission composed of five men.

The Senator from Illinois will see that I do not underrate the importance of the business in hand; but I do question most seriously and fundamentally the manner in which he proposes to deal with it—five commissioners, who shall take the affairs of all the great railway and canal companies and other means of transportation, and become the superior board of direction for all this great business, and have the power to pass upon such questions as are suggested by the bill. And the commission is to be "appointed so that the different interests affected"—that means to say the great industrial and leading interests of this country of sixty millions of people—"shall have a proper representation" upon the board of commission. What is "a proper representation?" Upon what basis is the propriety of that representation to be fixed? Is it to be upon the pecuniary interest or upon the number of people involved in it, the livelihood of a given number of inhabitants?

Further, they are to fix "a reasonable rate of compensation." I apprehend that questions of reasonable rates of compensation have engaged men all over this country by hundreds and thousands; and the quarrels, the objections, the protests, the litigation that has followed upon the attempt to bring the common carriers under some general rule of "reasonable rates of transportation" in the exercise of their powers has been more fruitful of indeterminate and unsatisfactory contests than almost any question that can be named.

I hope I shall not be understood as expressing here an unalterable determination to oppose the scheme of the honorable Senator and those who may think with him, but I have said this much only for the purpose of showing that we are attempting to deal in a somewhat summary manner with interests far greater than those which have ever been made the subject of regulation by a commission. A government by commission has in it strongly the suggestion of an unwarranted delegation of discretion. If the Congress may pass what laws they will in respect of regulating traffic, it is very much to be considered, and I submit it for the consideration of those who have interest in this subject, whether the discretion of Congress as to its regulations can be deposited in five men to be chosen by Congress.

This bill, as I have read it, abounds in discretionary powers. What has been commonly called the "rule of thumb" is to be found here in almost every section. Whether it "shall seem to be just," "shall seem to be reasonable," "shall seem to be proper," is the rule laid down; and whose minds are to be affected by these opinions and by this discretion? Five commissioners; and they are to deal with interests ten times greater than the whole external commerce of the people of the United States.

I say that nothing can exceed the importance of this question. Its magnitude grows the more it is considered. For that reason it is important that we should deal with it wisely; and in order to deal with it at all there must be concurrence between the two branches of Congress. I submit that even if it has taken the House of Representatives ten years or six years to mature a bill that came into this body only to die, ten years of gradual approach and deliberation upon a subject of this kind is much wiser than one year of too great progression in a decisive direction that may turn out not to have been wise.

But sir, without regard to the wisdom or the want of wisdom of the measures proposed to the Senate, it is perfectly plain as a practical question that the concurrence of the judgments of the two Houses is essential for the purpose of framing law. We know that even to-day (and I have the right so far to refer to it), this very question is pending and under debate, it may be that it is now being voted upon, twelve hundred feet from where we now stand. It is plain to me that if we wish to be practical and to reach some result upon this very interesting subject we had better await some finality, some determination, some expression of judgment on the part of those whose concurrence is as essential to our suggestion as our own is to them. Neither can act by itself. It is the joint will of the two Houses and the constitutional majority of both that are essential. Therefore as this measure, I think not improperly—I do not say necessarily but not improperly—originated in the other branch, I prefer to see what they propose shall be done in this question. When it comes before us then we shall see whether we can concur or not, or concur with such amendments as shall be reasonable and proper.

I did not mean to express any opinion upon this subject, although I have indirectly perhaps by implication done so, for I can not but feel that there never was such a power proposed to be conferred upon five men on earth as is proposed to the five commissioners who shall regulate the interstate commerce of the thirty-eight States and the ten Territories of this Union.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator in his remarks has shown conclusively that the best thing to do is to proceed with the discussion of the bill before the Senate. The Senator has intimated his views upon the question, and has undertaken to criticise the bill before the Senate, as I think, wrongly.

As a matter of fact the five commissioners provided for in the bill have no absolute power. The transportation companies of the country are not absolutely in their power, but the commission is put forward by the Government of the United States as a means of controlling and facilitating commerce between the States. If the Senator will read the bill he will find that the commission will have no absolute power to dispose of any question finally which is submitted to them for consideration. It is true the bill provides that they shall have a quasi power of arbitration, but any complainant, either the shipper or the transportation company, can refuse to abide by any decision that the commission, when it shall be created, undertakes to make between the parties. The Senator will find upon reading the bill that finally the courts of the country have the disposition of all controversies in case either party sees proper to take the controversy to the courts.

So I think the Senator misapprehends the provisions of the bill; and whether he does or not, it seems to me that his very statement of the importance of the question and of the uncertainty as to what the House of Representatives, if I may be allowed to refer to it, is going to do upon the question, calls upon the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The Senator says the subject has not only been before the House of Representatives, but it has been before the Senate also. I am not advised as to whether that is true or not, but I take it for granted that it is; but the very fact that it has been before the Congress of the United States so long, coupled with the fact that the people of this country are calling upon us for some legislation upon this great question, is an argument in itself why we should proceed with it without further delay. It is true, as the Senator says, that nothing can be accomplished by the two Houses running in parallel lines, but nothing can be accomplished unless the two Houses consider the question and finally come to an agreement. Everybody knows that before anything can be accomplished some bill must be passed by the Congress of the United States, and, as I say, the people of this country expect this Congress to take action; and if they do, and if it is an important question to the country, why not proceed with the consideration of it in the hope that the two Houses of Congress may eventually get together and pass some proper legislation?

I am not disposed simply to consume the time of the Senate in running in parallel lines with the House of Representatives, but neither am I disposed to lay aside a bill that is before the Senate for the purpose simply of awaiting the action of the House, which is as indefinite as anything can be, to ascertain what they are going to do. I think we have some status in this country as a co-ordinate branch of the Congress of the United States. While, as I say, I am not disposed to consume the time of the Senate, yet I am disposed to insist upon the consideration of this bill until we arrive at some conclusion as to what is the best interest of the country in regulating and facilitating interstate commerce.

The PRESIDENT prò tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment proposed also by himself.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana is not at present in order, as it relates to a different part of the bill. There are two amendments now pending.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask that mine be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed as an amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in order to avoid the criticism of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], and at the same time to effect the purpose which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and myself both have with reference to this amendment, I desire to suggest a modification of it; which I think upon hearing it read the Senator from Illinois may be willing to accept in lieu of the amendment proposed by himself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modification will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 11 it is proposed to add:

And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations, in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of all the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commisssion, in conducting said investigation, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

Mr. WILSON. The modification of the amendment just read simply directs the investigation of the general subject and eliminates the duty of the preparation and presentation of a bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the predisposition of my mind is always to listen to the opinions of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] with great respect; but I confess that I have been somewhat surprised by the observations he has made and the arguments he has employed this afternoon with regard to this bill.

I think upon reflection that he would hardly be willing to adhere to the proposition that contemporaneous discussion of a subject professedly of profound importance can not be permitted in the two Houses of Congress; that when the House of Representatives is engaged in deliberating upon a question that concerns the people of the entire country the Senate of the United States must either take up some other topic of thought or go into executive session.

Mr. President, I am disposed to believe that the Senator from Delaware did not give his customary deliberation to this subject when he advanced that as a reason why upon this great question debate should cease. We have been told that the House of Representatives now for ten years have been engaged in grappling with this great topic. Whether they have not sent us a bill I am not prepared to say. We are advised that at one time four or five years ago a bill did reach us that, as we are informed, either died in committee or was otherwise disposed of in the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I can state that the bill which passed the House was passed March 26, 1874.

Mr. INGALLS. Ten years ago the House of Representatives passed a bill upon a subject that during the entire interval since has engrossed the attention of the people of this country more than any other, and they have since that time been engaged in endeavoring to elaborate some measure that up to this time has failed to receive the support of a majority of that body; and we, after a week or ten days' discussion of this subject, are advised by the Senator from Delaware that it is best that we should cease to debate it until the House of Representatives see fit to send us the result of their deliberations. In the opinion of the Senator from Delaware the way to reach a decision upon this subject is not to discuss it or think about it! He informs us, what every one knows, that there is no topic of profounder interest at this time than the subject of interstate commerce and the regulation of railway transportation.

We have various propositions upon the subject before us. They are usually elaborated by debate. Discussion is commonly considered as the method by which valuable results are to be obtained. And here, with less than two months of this session remaining, the Senator from Delaware advises the Senate that the proper way to deal with the subject and to reach proper conclusions is to do nothing about it—practically that; because the House of Representatives have discussed this subject for ten years without reaching any decision, and they have been engaged during the greater part of this session in discussing this subject without reaching a conclusion. What assurance have we that, after this debate has thus long continued, we are shortly to receive the result of the deliberations of the House of Representatives?

Mr. President, we may as well deal candidly with ourselves upon this subject. The Senate of the United States is suspected by the people of this country—I use plain language—the Senate of the United States is suspected by the people of this country with a desire not to do anything with this subject. I do not need to appeal to the consciousness of any Senator. I do not need to appeal to the current strain of observations that are made in the public press when I say that the Senate of the United States is not an object of public adoration at this time in this country. I regretted to hear the Senator from Delaware, supposed to be the leader of a new public opinion under the new evangel of reform in the days that are to come, gravely recommending to the Senate of the United States to pursue the do-nothing policy that has characterized Congress upon this subject for ten years last past.

I have not familiarized myself sufficiently with the various features of this bill and the amendments that are now before the Senate to be able to say which of them will ultimately command my assent; but, sir, I desire that the debate shall proceed for the purpose of enabling me to determine which of them is best calculated to reach a solution of this gigantic question that is at the present time engaging the attention of the people of this country. I do not stand here in any sense whatever as the advocate or champion of that cheap system of demagogy that appeals to public opinion against railroads. I would as much resist injustice to railroads as I would resist injustice to the humblest settler in the remotest dugout upon the frontier of the West. Railway corporations are creatures of law; they are entitled to the protection of the law. I would stand between them and injustice as I would between injustice and any one of my humblest constituents; but it can not be denied that there is in this country at the present time a conviction, in which I profoundly share, that the railway corporations of this country have made exactions that render it necessary that they should be subjected to limitation and to control. This subject is too far advanced, it is too wide, its proportions are too immense to allow us to sit down in a sleepy, Rip Van Winkle inactivity, and declare that because it is novel and tentative we will not deal with it, and because it is under discussion in the House of Representatives we will not deliberate upon it.

I do not know, Mr. President, but that the time is rapidly approaching when the active coalition of the conservative forces of this country is not to be required in order to prevent destructive organic changes in our system of government. The people of this country labor under burdens that they themselves do not understand and for which they ask us to afford satisfactory solution. They ask nothing that is unreasonable; they ask nothing that is unjust. They do demand that these subjects shall be discussed, and that if possible we shall reach some solution that will enable us to protect them from the burdens under which they labor. And, sir, the man or the body of men who attempt to stand in the pathway of this great inquiry, who attempt to arrest it or to block it, will be as absurd politically as would be physically the man who should attempt to refute the law of gravitation by jumping from the summit of the Washington Monument.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the few remarks that I submitted with respect to this bill have furnished the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] apparently with material for a good deal of discursive effort on his part. My object was to bring this legislation to some practical end, and I made the suggestion that to do that we must procure some concurrent action of the two Houses, that in the many years this question has been discussed there has been a failure to do that. The House of Representatives has passed a bill which has been brought here to the Senate and it here has died, and therefore we have no law of the United States upon this subject. I did state that in my judgment it was important and that the most intelligent men, those most deeply interested for themselves and others in this great problem of interstate communication and commerce, felt that there was a necessity for some general legislation, some general regulation under the Federal power over this broad and deep question. My object plainly was to reach a practical result and not to waste time upon that which was wholly without practical result.

The Senator suggests in some way that suspicion will attach to the movements of those who shall express their opinions in a manner that may lead to the inference that they are for or against certain measures. Well, Mr. President, I do not know how it feels to be suspected. So far in my life I have not suffered from that. I do not know how far the Senate of the United States is suspected, for if it has members open to suspicion they are not those of my association, and certainly I do not feel myself to be one of the number. I am perfectly indifferent to such suspicions if they exist; I do not think they do.

Mr. President, we have passed, as our Calendar will show, some two hundred bills that await the action of the House of Representatives. I only hope in the sixty days that remain of this session there may be action by the House of a concurrent nature that may lead to the enactment of those measures into laws, for among them there are many of importance. It is for that reason that I would be glad not to pass a bill in the Senate not in accord with the expression, almost the concurrent expression of the House upon the same subject, and have the two measures standing without any result for the rest of this session. I am desirous that there should be some step taken upon this grave subject. I am unable to see the wisdom of the proposition contained in this bill. But that is not the question. The thing is whether you will reach a practical result more quickly by continuing to debate this bill now upon an utterly dissimilar character of view and action from that which is going on elsewhere in this building to-day, or whether you will await that which every public paper tells us is probable, that there will be a measure brought before the Senate for its concurrence or for its rejection.

That is the practical question; and I interposed what was intended to be a practical suggestion in regard to it, that we should come much nearer to a common result by first hearing what the co-ordinate branch of Congress said. There was not one word in what I said suggestive of the idea that the same subject should not be currently considered by the two Houses. I referred to the fact that the minds of two Houses had met upon this subject and had differed; and if they differed in the past they were likely to differ in the future. But as this difference had occurred and had resulted in postponement of any action whatever upon a subject on which the Senator from Kansas is anxious, and all of us I trust are anxious, for a wise result, not an unwise one, it seemed to me that we should be more apt to get it speedily by not antagonizing in advance an opinion which, for better or for worse, formed the basis of our possible agreement. That is all there was of it; that is all that I meant; that is all that I mean now. I should be very glad to listen, and to no member of the body would I listen with more interest than the Senator from Kansas, if he would give us a disquisition, not upon the abuses, not upon the favoritisms, not upon the discriminations, not upon the obvious iniquities and wrongs which are to-day illustrated by our interstate commerce and the management of the transportation companies—not that, but as to what rule we may safely substitute for State regulation and State visitation upon such irregularities and such injustice.

That the various States of this Union have it in their power to prevent discriminations is already attested by laws of some of the Western States which have passed the criticism of the Supreme Court of the United States and have been sustained. Therefore the question is for the people of this country whether they shall now make a new departure and deposit in the hands of the central Government the exercise of those powers constitutionally granted, but which are to be exercised as suggested now, in lieu of the local legislative control to which the whole of these transporting companies owe their chartered rights, and under whose laws the contracts contained in their charters have been granted. Well, sir, as I said before, it is almost impossible to exaggerate the importance of this question, not only as to the variety of interests, but as to the enormous amounts involved, and as to the danger of dealing hastily with such powers as I believe are vested in the Government and in the Congress of the United States over this great question of interstate commerce.

If from what I have said there is to be inferred an opposition to the subject of abating this injustice, of compelling justice in respect of the contracts for the transportation of merchandise and the like in this country, I only can say that it will be very ignorant and very unjust on the part of any one so to consider it; and the trial of that charge must of course depend upon the votes or speeches and the like that I may give here in my place in the Senate. It is my good fortune, sir, to be able to deal with public questions with great frankness and with a great disregard of suspicions from any quarter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I offered, as I think the modified amendment of the Senator from Iowa does away with the necessity of the amendment I offered to his original amendment, or to mine, as it appears to be. So I ask leave to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to withdraw it, the yeas and nays not having been ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us understand, then, how the proposition is presented.

Mr. WILSON. I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Illinois to withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. That was all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So that the question is now on the original amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let us hear it read, Mr. President.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend that by substituting for it the amendment I now send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa proposes to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, which is in print, by substituting therefor that which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce, which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed, for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. The rest of the amendment is just as printed. The change is in the few lines that have been read, requiring the commission to precede their report on this subject with an investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one later change, the Chair thinks, in the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. If there is another, let it be read.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

For the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask that the first part of the amendment of my colleague may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce, which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that we ought not to be called upon to act upon a section so important as this without seeing it in print, so that we may know exactly upon what we are called to vote. With that object in view, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is desired that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the motion to print the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. INGALLS. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SUPPORT AND EDUCATION OF INDIAN PUPILS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, resubmitting the estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation of $2,000 for support and education of certain Flathead Indian pupils, which estimate was transmitted to the House by the Secretary of the Interior December 11, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ETC., AT MOUTH OF DETROIT RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board of an appropriation of $18,000 for completing the light-house and fog-signal at the mouth of Detroit River, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GUN FACTORY, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimates from the Secretary of the Navy of appropriations for the erection of a gun factory and for the purchase of steel for manufacture of heavy ordnance in pursuance of recommendations of the gun-foundery board, $2,500,000; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, as the Chair understands, insists upon the regular order.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask my friend from Texas to allow me to submit for consideration by unanimous consent a resolution in reference to business of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. REAGAN. If the matter can be disposed of without debate, I withdraw for the present my demand for the regular order.

BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That Tuesday, January 13, be assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills, and the special order adopted January 21 last, relating to reports from the Committee on Public Lands; and in case this order shall be interfered with on that day, it shall be continued in force until one day thereafter has been occupied by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. RANDALL and others called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Clerk will report the title of the bill which was under consideration at the adjournment of the House immediately before the holiday recess, and which now comes up as the continuing special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is an amendment pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas when he expects to get a vote on this bill. I presume he can give us some indication.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it is open to amendment on each section.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I merely wanted the gentleman from Texas to indicate to the House when he intends to take a final vote on the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. In about two weeks, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. As I understand the yeas and nays were ordered on a motion to close debate on the fourth section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that there was a motion made to close debate, but it was finally agreed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] should have ten minutes. There are now ten minutes remaining for debate upon the motion to strike out the fourth section. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the fourth section, which I propose to strike out.

The section was again read.

Mr. HORR. My recollection is, Mr. Speaker, that we have never debated that section at all under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Yes, it has been debated and amended, and finally, when there were no other amendments to the text, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] moved to strike out the entire section, and on that the debate was limited to ten minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] could have replied to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] when he asked when it was proposed to get through with this bill. The gentleman from Texas did not, I suppose, hear the question which was propounded to him, and I ventured at the time the short answer I supposed it would be disposed of in two weeks.

I will simply say, Mr. Speaker, that if it is the intention of this House to block all the important business of the session for the purpose of considering this bill, which seems to admit of so much discussion on every imaginable subject, then these gentlemen, if they wish to consult the interest of their constituents, had better make some movement to get before the House some of the important bills demanding attention, and let this matter be postponed for the present. Then we can see exactly where we stand in this House so far as the business of the country is concerned.

In reference to this particular question of long and short hauls I feel that I have been heard sufficiently in the remarks made when the matter was under discussion during the first days of the session. Now, all I desire to say further before yielding to my friend from Michigan

[Mr. HORR] is this, that the entire experience of railroad men, the entire experience of those interested in railroads, the innocent citizens so to speak, is that it is an utter impossibility to try to compel in their varied business the railroads to carry out any provisions restricting them to particular arrangements as to how they shall carry freights on long or short hauls. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, and I say this in all seriousness and in all sincerity, how it is possible to trammel the railroad corporations of this country so as to oblige them to carry out the idea promulgated in the fourth section of this bill. The experience of the members upon this floor—and I would like to call the attention of the House to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] on this subject, the remarks of a gentleman who has had so much to do in all kinds of business, who has been prominent in great enterprises—I say I would like to call particular attention of the members on this floor to the remarks of that gentleman where he showed in a logical manner how impossible it was to expect to trammel railroad corporations in the way indicated and so aid the shippers by any such injudicious action. I wish to protest again that never in the experience of any of these men who have been before the Committee on Commerce—I speak as well of railroad men as those interested in the carrying of freight on railroads—not one of them has given any intimation that any railroad company has charged more in proportion for a shorter haul simply because it wanted to charge less for a longer haul.

I will now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], with the expression of the hope that this House with a direct vote will strike out this fourth section of the bill, which, in my judgment, is so inimical to the business interests of this country.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, this fourth section contains a principle which will do more to render this bill absolutely injurious to the business interests of this country than all the balance of the provisions combined. That attempt to prevent competition in the carrying of products for long distances from the West and South to the East and to the seaboard will cripple the industries of this country beyond the power of expression. I say to the House that once enforce that bill and you will simply prevent the cheap food we eat to-day in the East from ever reaching that East at rates such as can compete with the importations from abroad.

The wheat of Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa is reaching the seaboard to-day at a very low figure, and reaching it at those figures simply because the through rates are not trammeled as this bill would trammel them. You can not possibly run the railroads of this country and keep them in existence if you compel the local traffic to be carried upon the same principles or upon the same bases you do the long through traffic which travels thousands of miles.

I have stated already to the House, Mr. Speaker, but I want to repeat it, that this fourth section will do more to cripple the commerce of the West and to reduce the price of land in every Western and Southern State than any clause I can now possibly imagine this House could adopt.

Now, understand me. I expect you gentlemen intend to pass this bill; but let me say one thing, which perhaps I ought not to say, but once and awhile I like to say a thing which one may not have the right to say, and that is this: If you gentlemen would be governed by your ideas of what are proper business principles this fourth section could not get twenty votes on your side of the House, and if it is passed it will be passed simply as a matter of political clap-trap, in order that you may claim to have done something against the railroad monopolies of this country.

Take all of that sort of humbug out of the minds of you gentlemen, and as a business proposition I hope you know too much to pass a law which will cripple the entire business of the country, as this bill will cripple it.

I do not expect you to strike out this section, but I do expect to have the glorious privilege of not only telling this House what I believe the result will be, but of voting according to my convictions on business principles on such a purely business matter. On business principles, I repeat, no man can sustain this fourth section. It will do more to injure the transportation of this country than any one small section in any bill ever passed by this House. It ought to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-three members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 90, nays 128, not voting 105; as follows:

Mr. PATTON with Mr. VALENTINE, for this day.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my name has been announced as paired with my colleague, Mr. CONNOLLY. My pair was only to extend until Monday. I believe, however, it will be arranged. I make the announcement in justice to myself and to him, and will withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. EVERHART. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 4 add the following:
"Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to any railroad company in competition with water-way lines of transportation running laterally in the same direction."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to this section corresponding with the amendment already adopted to the first section; and I ask unanimous consent that to avoid the necessity of offering repeated amendments to the different sections the same words be added in each section where they apply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will send up his amendment.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 6, section 4, after the word "railroad," insert "or pipe line."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I also offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, section 4, after the word "road," where it twice occurs, insert "or pipe line."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now ask unanimous consent that the same amendment be made to the subsequent sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that those parts of the sections where he desires to insert the words indicated may be stricken out. The gentleman had better reserve his amendment until the sections are under consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well, I shall do so.

The Clerk read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of expressing some views in reference to a speech made recently by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope other gentlemen will be allowed to express their views on this section without being cut off by calling the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. On the last day before this on which the bill before the House was under consideration—the 19th of December—the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] made a very extraordinary speech, to which I would then have replied if I could have heard his remarks, which I was prevented from doing by the confusion in the Hall. Though the holidays have intervened the remarks of the gentleman require an answer now, on the first occasion on which it could be made.

The gentleman said he arose to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], but made his speech on the side taken by that gentleman. He then said:

I arise to oppose the amendment. The discussion begins already to emphasize the unwisdom and injustice of the bill. It is a vain effort to make a code which shall control the management of railways in all cases. But these cases are infinite in number and very nearly infinite in variety. How absurd to suppose that all these cases can be held in the iron grasp of half a dozen absolute restrictions.

This shows that either he had not read the bill he was animadverting on, or that if he had read it he did not understand it. It is not an effort to make a code which shall govern railroads in all cases, infinite in number and variety, as he alleges. It only prohibits their managers from committing crimes against their patrons, and provides for their punishment when they do so. He next says:

But you can not say to a railroad company, "You shall not discriminate, you shall not rebate, you shall not pool, you shall not charge more for a longer haul," because in many cases all these methods are right and in many cases they are necessary—necessary even to the very existence of the road. And because they are necessary often to their very existence the railways will elude, evade, and openly transgress the restrictions, looking to popular opinion to shield them from the penalty. Just as the gentleman from Texas, if his life were threatened, would, in defending it, violate all laws and escape all punishment.

But he has in no way enlightened us as to how the making of discriminations between shippers, the allowance of rebates, the practice of pooling, or the charging of more for a short than for a long haul are right and necessary "to the very existence of the railroads." And because they are necessary, he says the railroads will elude, evade, and openly transgress restrictions.

The gentleman undoubtedly wishes us to understand that the railway corporations are now the masters of this country and of its property and rights, and that, being masters, they will disobey and defy our laws if the laws do not please them. And we should remember that this comes from one who is largely interested in the ownership and management of railroads, and who has, at the same time, been selected by his constituents as one of the lawmakers of the United States. He then said:

And if you fear that some obstacles are too mighty, remember that ten years ago we all said, with the Erie, the Central, and the Pennsylvania Railways in the field, New York can secure no relief except from the resources of the national Treasury. But while we spoke, competition, raising $100,000,000 without public knowledge or public solicitation, threw the Nickel Plate and West Shore into the arena, and there they will remain. [Applause.]

* * * * * * *

Managers were never more solicitous for business, and never more ready to make sacrifices to get it. They know that rivals are so many they must themselves create and develop it, and in a one-sided partnership, where the customer gets all the benefit, they aid him in its creation or development.

If this means anything it is that these trunk roads named are competing roads, and that the Nickel Plate is a competitor of all the rest for cheap freights for the benefit of the people. Now, if he does not know it everybody else does, that this statement is not true. We all know, and he must know, that all of the roads he named and many more have pooled their freights and earnings, and are now being operated under the pool in order to effectually deprive the people of all the benefits of competition, and in order that they may be enabled to dictate such charges for carrying freight as they may think proper. And we must infer from another part of the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] that this is his idea of the method of making railroad management popular with the people and of gratifying the natural desire of the railroad managers to secure "that good report, that good reputation, which is the highest prize of life."

The gentleman from New Jersey draws a distinction between the managers of railroads, whom he honors, and the great speculators in their securities, whom he despises. His statement on this point would have been more satisfactory if he had gone a little further and told us to which of these classes he assigns Mr. Gould and Mr. Vanderbilt. Are they not both engaged in the management of great systems of railroads? Are they the good men who manage railroads, or are they of those who, to use the language of the gentleman from New Jersey, "seize the stock, hold it for a day, until they have worked their own wicked will on it, and then cast it out dishonored, to be the prey of the next adventurer."

The gentleman from New Jersey then caps the climax of his argument in the following brilliant peroration:

Let, then, the laws of man and of nature continue their work of progress and reform. Why attempt to restrict, why pass restrictions which will interfere with these general laws, which are working out the results you pretend to wish? Your effort is vain; your restrictions will be disregarded. Do you ask me how?

The railways, if these restrictions should become laws, will ostentatiously break them all. They will invite litigation until the wheels of the courts are clogged. That will challenge public attention, and public attention is redress. Or they will issue an order, which the whole railway system shall obey, that every locomotive from sea to sea shall stay in its roundhouse; then there will follow a silence from Portland in Oregon to Portland in Maine that can be felt, and only one voice will be heard, the familiar voice of our Speaker: "The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider a bill to repeal an act entitled 'An act to regulate interstate commerce.' Is there objection?" Mr. Speaker, just so sure as the report follows the flash, we shall hear as the end of the matter: "The Chair hears none." [Loud applause.]

This is the language of a member of this House; of one branch of one of the most august legislative assemblies in the world. It is the language of a man of great wealth and of high social position. It is the language of an extensive railroad owner and representative. It is the language of one who, from his social position, great wealth, and political eminence, we would reasonably expect to find law-abiding and conservative, a lover of order regulated by law. But he chooses in this arena, in this law-making assembly, and before the whole American people, in the interest of a class of people, to menace and attempt to intimidate Congress with a threat that if it passes a just and reasonable and necessary law to protect the great body of the people against the greed, the rapacity, the tyranny of the class which he represents, that class will "ostentatiously" violate that law and "invite litigation until the wheels of the courts are clogged." And this threat is made in view of the fact that the managers of the railroads can, and do now, besides paying the interest on the investments in them, levy such tribute as they please on the commerce of the country to pay hired lawyers and lobbyists to control conventions and elections and to influence Legislatures and Congress in opposition to the passage of laws to take this extraordinary power from them and to protect the people against them. But I think the gentleman misjudges as to their power to block the wheels of the courts so as to prevent the administration of justice. His friends would no doubt soon become tired of this luxury. There are too many courts, State and Federal, and too much purity and patriotism still left on the bench of the country for the railroads to intimidate or to suborn them all.

His other threat, that the railroads will issue an order, if this bill shall be passed, "which the whole railroad system shall obey"—no may about this—"that every locomotive from sea to sea shall stay in its roundhouse until there will follow a silence which will be felt from Portland in Oregon to Portland in Maine," is as puerile as it is utterly without the support of law or the sanction of morals; as wanting in discretion as it is unjust in purpose. If the railroad managers should be foolish enough and wicked enough to attempt to put this threat into execution they would lay themselves liable, at the suit of every shipper, for the damage caused by their non-performance of their duty. And if they would adhere for a sufficient time to so suicidal a policy they would get judgments enough against them to cause the sale of their roads and their transfer to the hands of others, who would no doubt protect themselves by avoiding such folly in future. And, besides this, by such conduct they would forfeit their charters and subject them to be revoked on account of so wicked an attempt to use them for lawless and revolutionary purposes.

This attempt to intimidate and overawe Congress by such threats to use lawless violence to nullify an act of Congress passed in the exercise of its undoubted constitutional authority and for a most beneficent purpose is addressed to the wrong body and in the wrong age of the world to either have the desired effect or to command the respect of a virtuous and law-abiding people. [Applause.]

[Before Mr. REAGAN had concluded the above remarks the five minutes to which he was entitled expired.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was recognized and yielded Mr. REAGAN his time.

Mr. REAGAN then resumed and concluded the remarks printed above.]

Mr. PHELPS was recognized, and asked how much time he was entitled to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to five minutes under the rules of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. It will be scarcely possible to treat of this whole subject, as touched by the gentleman from Texas, in so short a time. The time, however, is sufficient for me to say that I recognize in his remarks just that intellectual defect, if I may say it without offense, which has made it impossible for him to prepare a bill which would be operative and therefore useful; one that would work, and therefore that could be enforced. It is an inability to make proper and natural distinctions. I stated what under the laws of trade and nature will be; and the gentleman claims that I stated what ought to be, as if I were the Almighty, and threatened what should be. He has failed to recognize the distinction between a prophecy and a threat. I made no threat. I have no power to carry a threat into execution, and certainly have no wish to see the prophecy fulfilled and the business of this country blocked by the gentleman's bill and the action of the railways under it. Whether I am a true prophet or not time will show. Whether I have grounds for making this prophecy or not the past and its history fortunately can show. There are precedents.

Take a case, coming out of this House, not very different from this case which the gentleman from Texas is anxious to inject into it. Both cases struck the legislation of the country. Probably the gentleman is not familiar with the case I refer to. Were he, he would have recognized that my prophecy was only an easy prediction of the future from the past.

The gentleman from Texas was in another section of the country and engaged in giving his high character and his great ability to the support of another cause when a distinguished Representative of Pennsylvania, equally able, equally respectable, giving his efforts to the cause of the Union, concluded that he would undertake by legislation to correct the crying evil of those times. He thought the great obstacle to a successful prosecution of the war which was waged for our country was the speculation in gold—was that speculators would buy and sell it and raise its price—just as the great trouble at this time, in the opinion of the gentleman from Texas, is that railways will manage their business with the object of making money by it, will charge for their services, and will not consent to carry the freight and passengers of the country for nothing. He sees that it would be for the interest of his section of the country if they were forced to change this policy. So it was for the interest of Mr. Stevens's section of the country in its loyal struggle that gold should be kept at par, and he made the attempt to do it. Is there a man on this floor, unless possibly my friend from Texas, who forgets the result of that effort?

The great Republican leader passed his bill prohibiting all dealings in gold. He too was shocked at the suggestion that any act of this august legislative body should stand helpless before the facts, yet how short was the time before he found that his attempt to overcome the natural laws of trade and commerce was a pitiable failure. The price of gold, in proud defiance, rose rapidly out of sight; business was checked, the existence of the country was threatened; and, wise as patriotic, no member was readier than the author to assist in the immediate repeal of the unfortunate law. And I did the justice to the gentleman from Texas to suppose, as I stated in what he is pleased to call my eloquent peroration, that when the laws of commerce and trade should be found to be just as potent against his edict as they were against that of Thaddeus Stevens he would be just as wise and patriotic in the readiness with which he would ask that his edict might be annulled and the business of the country restored. This is why I say, Mr. Speaker, I had a right to prophesy, not to threaten, what I did; and in my statement there was much of prediction and nothing of threat.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHELPS. If I could be allowed——

Mr. KEAN. I will take the floor and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I now yield to an indiscretion—I certainly yield to a very natural feeling of injury, in view of the fact that it is the gentleman from Texas who makes this attack and seems to inspire it with a certain suggestion of personal feeling. I recognize this, I say, with an impression that it is unbecoming and unjust. He has been pleased to class me as among those citizens of this Republic who by frugality and industry, by honorable and honest methods, I hope, have accumulated a competence. He has been pleased to call me a rich man. If I may make a personal confession—and I make it now only under his taunt and in the interest of the truth, which we all search for in this great discussion—I can say this: If once I enjoyed that distinction, such as it is, which belongs to wealth, that distinction has been diminished, has been almost entirely destroyed; and if I were asked where I found the origin of my misfortunes, I should be obliged to say that the gentleman himself knows the origin; and the gentleman himself lives in the very section and uses the same railway in which half a million of dollars intelligently and honestly invested were sunk, and apparently were sunk forever.

I have no hesitation in charging that the railway which made his home at Palestine valuable, and gave it distinction other than the solitary distinction which it enjoyed before of being the residence of an able and patriotic citizen, obtained its railway connection, secured its growth and all the advantages which it now enjoys and which the gentleman from Texas himself shares, through the efforts and sacrifices of myself and some dozen of my friends, who, in a New York office, agreed to embark in the enterprise. It was an enterprise to build a railway which, starting at Houston, should traverse the State and open up counties which were then almost worthless, to connection with the North and the South. This was an honorable and a useful purpose; I put in my money cheerfully, and citizens associated with me, of more wealth but with equally honest purpose, put in still larger sums. The money was expended, dollar for dollar, in the construction of the road; we took for it stock at par; we received for it nothing else, not even bonds, which we might have sold.

It was our pride to test and settle this question: Could a railway be built honestly, with each dollar that was actually invested represented and no other, no watering of stock or bonds, and pay a fair interest upon the money invested? So dollar after dollar, to the amount of some millions, each one of which passed through my hands, was faithfully sent down to the State of Texas and put into the Great Northern Railroad. It was invested in buying land, in making cuts and fillings, in bridging streams, in purchasing and laying the rails upon the road which now connects the Gulf of Mexico with the great system of railways by which Palestine has become an important station on a great through route. That was the result for Palestine and Texas. What has been the result for us? Our money is in that railroad, honestly and carefully expended as a man expends his own, and as yet I have not received one dollar of interest upon that stock, nor do I ever expect to obtain any. The investment would be to me and to my friends an absolute loss, that money would all have been lost, except for this precaution: I foresaw the benefits that would be received by the gentleman from Texas and others who owned land along the route, so I wisely made some investment in it myself.

The lands did receive the benefit—were so far benefited by this New York money which was made to enrich them, and among them the farm and other real estate of my friend in Palestine, that our loss, although not recouped, was somewhat broken by their appreciation in value. Land on this road now sells for two, three, or four times its value at the time this undertaking was begun.

If, then, this railroad has accomplished so much for his section; if it has made us who gave it lose all of the money which built it; if we built it nor asked one dollar from the gentleman, though his farm was sure to get an advantage from it; if not one dollar was received from any other citizen of Texas, is it strange that having had this experience in that State and similar experience in other States we are hurt at the reception we receive here when we get up and speak not from theory but from experience, not immodestly, not arrogantly, telling only what we know, even if we do in the interest of truth tell the gentleman from Texas that we speak of actual knowledge while he speaks only as a theorist.

Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to show exactly how each one of his four restrictions, that against discrimination, against rebates, against pooling, against charging more for shorter than for longer hauls, all of them would injure every single acre of his farming land around Palestine, and crush, as if under an avalanche, every growing industry in its streets.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I wish to disabuse the mind of the gentleman from New Jersey that I was in any way animated by any feeling of special malevolence against him, as such was not the fact. I was dealing with a great public question, and to the language I then used I refer the House and the country to see whether the animadversions which I felt it my duty to make are justly founded or not.

I should regret, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had his investment sacrificed in building up the country or its railroads, but I apprehend the gentleman's picture is deficient in the statement of all the facts. He says the investment was made in that railroad. There were two of them, but both were under one charter. One of them received sixteen sections of six hundred and forty acres of land to the mile and the other received twenty sections of six hundred and forty acres of land to the mile. The one which received the smallest amount received a bonus, upon which I am now paying a tax, to the amount of $150,000 from the poor county in which I live in order to induce the building of a depot there. And I contributed also my full portion of about $50,000 in money and property in order to secure the building of a depot of the other road at that place.

Therefore, while the gentleman is speaking of the munificence of his liberality, he ought to remember that he and the others to whom he has referred received liberal charters from the State and most generous treatment on the part of the county in which I live.

I wish to say further, that notwithstanding the magnificent treatment on the part of the State, the county, and district in which I live to these railroads, there is not one there to-day who would desire to see any injury befall these railroads, so far as I know. We wish them to prosper. We regard them as valuable, as excellent servants; but we regard them also as detestable masters. We do not wish them as masters. We do not intend to have them as masters. We wish them well. We hope they may be profitable. In view of the liberal charters granted to the roads in which the gentleman is a stockholder, besides the bonus of land and money given by others in the State, I do not think that his remarks on this subject were quite what they ought to have been.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. I did not mean to say the railroads did not receive any aid from the State of Texas, nor do I think I made my statement so as to warrant that conclusion. What I said was, that there was no citizen of Texas asked to subscribe, or who did, so far as I know, subscribe one dollar of his private funds to the construction of this railroad. It was the gift exclusively of Northern capital.

With reference to the generosity of the State I want to say this: The inducement to build this railroad, for at that time the unoccupied country offered no business to encourage its construction, was the formal act of the State by which it agreed to give us its bonds. I regret that truth requires me to state what I had no intention of stating, and what is now drawn out by the comments of the gentleman, that the State of Texas having agreed with us that in consideration of building this road they would give us of those bonds a certain number to the mile, did absolutely refuse to keep their bargain, and did repudiate their obligation.

Every effort was made by appeals to the Legislature and to the executive and elsewhere throughout the State to obtain a fulfillment of their promise, but the State persisted. The bonds were prepared, signed, and ready for delivery, but Texas refused to issue and deliver them to the railroad company. Had the State of Texas kept its promises, had it not repudiated its just obligations, and had it given to us the $8,000 to the mile that were promised—a repudiation and refusal, which they wisely made after the railway was constructed and built—I believe that before this time we might have received some interest upon our investment. As it is, the investment is there; it produces no results for the investors. And the road is there; it is run satisfactorily and produces valuable results to Texas and its citizens who use it. It satisfies all their reasonable wants; it is giving them rates of freight and passage cheaper than any known outside of the United States; and yet we are not getting from it one dollar of interest. And while the gentleman from Texas tells us that the charter is so good and the State is so good that we shall see in time a profit, are we impatient when we complain in the face of his statement that he would be glad to administer the investment himself under the laws of the United States, that we ought to be paid some of the interest of the last twelve years before our property is taken from us?

I would like to show, Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes remaining, how the first restriction imposed by the gentleman would affect his own home at Palestine. He would forbid all discrimination. In the shipment of all classes of freights brought to the same station at the same time, he would enforce, under penalty, equal dispatch. If the railway moved one parcel before another it would be punished. Well, let us see how such a provision would work at Palestine. Let us suppose three kinds of freight are delivered at this station for transportation on the same day. Let us assume that one is a shipment of fruit, one a shipment of coal, and the other a shipment of grain. They are delivered at the Palestine station at the same time, and must therefore, under the Reagan law, be carried off at the same time. The daily freight train comes along to its regular morning task with the usual number of vacant cars ready for the ordinary needs of Palestine, but the three shipments make more than the usual tonnage. The capacity of the empty cars is not sufficient for all the freight, and only part of it can be taken. The wise conductor, remembering the law and knowing its penalty, glances at the three piles of freight, then at the empty cars on his train, and recognizes the fact that he has not accommodations for the whole. He signals the engineer, the whistle is blown, and the train goes southward to Houston, ignoring fruit, coal, and corn. All three classes of goods are left at the station. What is the result? The fruit which might have been carried forward without injury is either injured or destroyed by the delay. The coal which was needed at Houston to keep in blast an iron furnace is left at Palestine; operations stop at the furnace, its fires burn low and its workers stand in enforced idleness—loss of capital and of work.

The law of the gentleman from Texas must be charged with the loss of this work and capital and with the loss or destruction of the fruit. And with what is it credited? What has it accomplished? Nothing; and all this is done in order that the grain, which might have been delivered days after without loss or injury to anybody, shall have the same facilities and be delivered at the same time as the coal and the fruit. It has estopped the owner of the grain from assailing his member of Congress at Palestine with the complaint that some one's coal and some one's fruit was carried by the railway before his grain; that it was an outrageous discrimination, and that he demands that the laws of the United States shall be made to prevent such outrages. And that is all it has done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word in response. The gentleman has made a charge which concerns me as a Representative of the State of Texas, of bad faith on the part of that State: that the State had agreed to give to one of these railroad companies $6,000,000 as a bonus to complete its road, and had refused to comply with the obligation.

It is true, sir, that the twelfth Legislature of that State did so—a Legislature which represented nobody in the main but a set of criminals and disreputable characters. They granted not only $6,000,000 to that road, but six millions to another road at the same time, and every sort of charter was made by wholesale out of which the legislators could make a profit to themselves and to the outsiders who were hanging around watching their chance to greedily pluck at the public treasury. That Legislature has become a byword and a hissing, and is to this day among the people of Texas. That proceeding was done while the other States in the Southern portion of the country were being robbed by the same sort of men, and almost to the same extent, at this period.

The people of Texas, knowing it to be notorious that these charters were obtained by fraud and corruption, determined not to pay the money fraudulently promised; but in order to do the best they could, and not to saddle the people with a debt of $12,000,000, made the company of which the gentleman from New Jersey is a member a grant of 12,800 acres of land to the mile of road built to satisfy their demand; and I may be permitted to state here that the land is worth at the lowest figure $2 in cash per acre for pasture and other purposes, and much of it is worth more than that.

I dislike, sir, to have to go into these things, but the gentleman makes it necessary that I should do so, and so far as it is necessary I shall try as far as I can, as one of the Representatives of the State of Texas, to take care of the character of that State when it is assailed. She shall not be charged with the violation of her contract obligations when that contract was notoriously obtained by fraud and corruption, and when it was intended to saddle a debt of $12,000,000 upon the State, which the people would not pay, to gratify the class of men that held power when decent men and citizens could not be members of the Legislature.

That is all I have to say. I do not propose to answer the criticisms of the gentleman upon the bill itself.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. The lands in question were also exempted from taxation.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague reminds me by stating that these lands which can now be sold for $2 or more per acre are not taxable, and were exempted from taxation for a period of twenty-five years.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. And the railroad too.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; and the railroad and the property connected with it are exempted from taxation for twenty-five years. So that in addition to the charter and 12,800 acres of land exempt from taxes for twenty-five years the railroad running through the center of the State and property connected with it are exempt from taxes for twenty-five years; and I think the gentleman might be satisfied and not arraign the State here.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to discuss this bill. But perhaps in justice to myself I should make a remark or two about it. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to enact apt legislation that will accomplish the result aimed at.

In ten years' service in this House I have seen many bills brought forward touching the question of interstate commerce. I recollect, sir, in 1874, when it was held in most of the States in the country, by the courts and by many of the people who discussed these questions, that under the Dartmouth College case and a long line of precedents there was no power in a State to prohibit the railway fixing its charge under the charter granted to it under the doctrine of vested rights. At that time, under the lead of Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, then a member of the Forty-third Congress, we sought to pass a bill here to regulate interstate commerce. It was discussed for two months, if I recollect aright. It was a bill providing for a commission. I thought then, and am inclined to think now, it was a wise bill. It passed the House. I recollect, and I have verified my recollection by reference to the Journal, that the Democratic members then present, some of whom are now present, almost unanimously voted against that bill; ay, sir, going further than that, and putting themselves upon the record as denying the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States by legislation prohibiting unjust tolls by railways upon such commerce.

Here is the resolution which on the 9th of February, 1874, was offered in the House and adopted under a suspension of the rules by yeas 172, nays 64:

Mr. J. Q. Smith moved that the rules be suspended and the following preamble and resolution adopted:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides in express terms that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; and

"Whereas this provision of the Constitution imposes upon Congress powers and duties of such high moment to the common commercial interests of the people of these States, as the citizens of one nation, as to have been a leading cause for the formation of the Union itself: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That in the judgment of this House it is within the constitutional power of Congress by law so to regulate commerce among these States as to protect that portion of our internal commerce which is among the several States from all unjust or oppressive tolls, taxations, obstructions, or other burdens, whether imposed by railroad companies or by combinations thereof, or by other common carriers, when engaged as the instruments of such portion of the commerce of the people; that the present condition and magnitude of the commerce among the States are such as to demand the prompt and wise exercise of the power and duty declared in this resolution."

That resolution was voted against by nearly all the Democratic members, including my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK], also Mr. MILLS.

Since that time, however, under a proper public opinion, the courts have overthrown the doctrine of vested rights as it was then claimed; and the railway mileage of the country has more than doubled, and the amount of product carried by the railways has more than doubled also in those ten years; and while the mileage has doubled and the product carried has doubled, the rate at which it is carried has been decreased by one-half.

Now it is everywhere, I believe, acknowledged in this country, in this Hall, in the State Legislatures, by the Federal and by the State courts, that the common law obtains touching this commerce, namely, that it shall be done at a reasonable rate. And if any man thinks he is aggrieved, the courts, both State and Federal, in a proper case, are open to him for redress; and the common law, like the grace of God, as some one has said, always stands ready to adjust itself to the necessities of each case.

It is said, however, with great force, that it is a practical denial of justice to force a man who has been charged an unreasonable rate upon a small haul of goods to enter the courts to enforce his remedy. This is true in many cases. Therefore I would enlarge the remedy. I would make it cheaper and more speedy. I would appoint a commission and give the proper legislation to advance the remedy, leaving the common law all the while intact to adjust itself to the merits of each case.

Therefore I was in favor of the bill reported by a majority of the committee, which provided a commission. It may not be perfect—I apprehend it was not perfect—but I believe it to be a step in the right direction, and I stood ready to vote for it, and voted against the substitute offered by way of amendment by the gentleman from Texas.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. I live a thousand miles from the seaboard and represent a constituency the products raised by which for the market have doubled in ten years' time. In that same ten years the rate for taking their product to market has decreased one-half. It stands me in hand, while I am always ready to co-operate in apt legislation to give needed relief—it stands me in hand as their Representative to see that the legislation proposed does not do exactly the thing that they do not want done. I believe that would be the effect of this legislation. I am not a very good railroad man. I have no interest in railroads and never had, except the interest that every citizen has. I have no pecuniary interest in them. Where, as in Illinois, in Iowa, in Nebraska, in Texas, car-loads originate by the multiplied thousands for the seaboard and for the foreign trade; where they gather them up at one station and then at another, and for a continuous haul, without stopping full employment for the cars from the beginning to the end, and where there is full employment in the main for the cars on the return trip, where it is no retail business, I do believe that kind of business is worth less than it is where you take it by the half car-load and the car-load at every station between those points and the seaboard, after you have waited two or three days to fill, in whole or part, the empty cars, and then take them up by retail to take to the market.

For these reasons, and many others, I can not get my own assent, although I have tried to get it by careful examination of this bill—the best examination I have been able to make—I can not get my own assent to vote for it. And I regret this, because I believe that some legislation on this subject should be had. Perhaps in the course of time, without legislation, under an enlightened and decided public opinion and a continuation of the development of railway management, these wrongs might largely right themselves. I would prefer, however, to assist in the righting of them by apt and proper legislation enlarging the remedy, but, as I before said, leaving the common law always ready to apply itself to the exact injury complained of. The arbitrary rule, proposed by the gentleman from Texas, that these roads shall not in any instance charge more for a longer than for a shorter haul, the folly of which he concedes himself, because in the last section he makes some exceptions, and as he concedes some exceptions he can not (for he is not all-wise) determine that there are no more exceptions—I say that this iron-clad rule would, as I believe, work harm and advance the rates upon the products of my section and of the greater part of the country without doing any good to the consumer of these products upon the seaboard or anywhere else. Therefore I shall, for these and other reasons my time will not permit me to state, be compelled, unless this substitute be materially amended, to vote against it.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HORR. I renew the amendment. I desire to occupy the time of the House but a moment. In a former discussion on this bill the following language was used by myself and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. HORR. If you can show me that railroad companies are becoming rich by means of extortionate charges I will go as far any man to correct the evil. But does my friend from Texas claim that the roads in his own State are at present charging these extortionate rates? Can he name to me a single road in that great Commonwealth, renowned for its vast territory and "magnificent distances," that has ever paid one cent to its original projectors? Is there within the boundaries of the State a single road that has ever returned to the men of England, of Europe, of New England, or New York 1 per cent. interest on the capital they have furnished to build up the road and develop the State? I am informed upon good authority that up to this time you have never paid a shilling to any man who invested his money in those enterprises. The State needs those roads. These men have advanced their money for the purpose of benefiting that country. They have made your State richer, more prosperous. They expected no immediate returns; they depended upon the future. They are still waiting, hoping that the growth of the State, the increase of local business, may some day bring them a little interest on their hazardous venture.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me one moment. He seems to be very familiar with railroads and other matters in Texas; but I will say to him that the stock of the Central Texas Railroad is worth more in the market today than that of any other railroad that I know of; the dividend-paying profit is larger.

Mr. HORR. You surprise me. I confess I am making my statement from memory. I put this very question to men two years ago in the committee, as the gentleman from Texas will remember, and was then told that up to that time not a single road in Texas had ever paid a single shilling of dividend on its original stock.

Mr. REAGAN. I have heard a hundred as false statements as that made to the committee since I have been on it.

I have since taken pains to look into the condition of the Central Texas Railroad, to which the gentleman referred and for which he vouched in such strong terms, and I now wish to correct him and to substantiate the statement I then made. I wish to show to the House that the gentleman was mistaken about this road being such a wonderful pecuniary success. I have before me the exact net earnings of that road for the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, which shows a large loss to its owners. Why, sir, they did not make within $200,000 enough money on that road during those three years to pay the interest on their bonds. To be accurate, they lacked $208,340. Thus it seems not only has this company failed to pay its stockholders anything, but it did not in those three years earn enough within over $200,000 to pay the interest on its bonded debt. And I assert that although the road is now connected with another road, the stock of the joint roads, instead of being the best-paying stock in the country, is nothing of the kind. So far as I can learn their stock is not found quoted on the boards anywhere in the United States as having any value at all. I merely make this statement now because on the former occasion I was taken at a disadvantage, and the gentleman from Texas seemed to think I was meddling with the affairs of his State, which he claimed to know so much more about than I did. I desire simply to show him that while my knowledge was not excessive he was in a much worse condition—indeed, was even more ignorant than I was myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he knows that after that road was built $12,000 of stock to the mile was issued—watered stock—on which we are now asked to pay dividends.

Mr. HORR. That does not affect the question; but I am glad the gentleman makes the statement. What difference does that make? Let me read again the statement of the gentleman from Texas:

He [Mr. HORR] seems to be very familiar with the railroads and other matters in Texas; but I will say to him that the stock of the Central Texas Railroad is worth more in the market to-day than that of any other railroad I know of.

The gentleman may get out under that clause limiting his statement to what he knows [laughter]; but certainly he can not get out in any other way. He concluded

The dividend-paying profit is larger.

Now what difference does it make, Mr. Speaker, whether the stock has been watered or not, if the road does not pay a shilling on either the watered or unwatered stock? Would watering the stock affect the amount of earnings? [Laughter.] If there is not profit sufficient arising from the running of the road to pay interest on its bonds, then my statement was accurate to the dot, and he should not have undertaken to place me, with my known diffidence, at such a disadvantage before the House. [Laughter.] Especially he should have known the condition of this road, so as to have been at least accurate.

Mr. BUDD obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] as intending to state that the stock which the gentleman from Texas said was the most valuable he knew of is absolutely valueless?

Mr. HORR. I will be careful in my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. HORR. But let me answer the question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BUDD. I will yield to the gentleman in order that he may answer that question.

Mr. HORR. What I stated is that I am utterly unable to find any quoted value of it in any work I have examined, and I tried to be thorough. How can the stock be valuable when the road does not earn the interest on its bonded debt?

Mr. REED. I am surprised.

Mr. BUDD. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "provided," in line 23, the following words, "at least five days before the same shall go into effect," and insert instead thereof the words, "and it shall be unlawful to make or charge any increase of or on such rates until the schedule containing such increase shall have been posted as hereinbefore provided for a period of at least fifteen days."

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Speaker, I will state briefly the object and scope of this amendment. That the publication of rates is one of the effective modes of preventing railroad discrimination and abuse, no one who has carefully studied the railroad question will deny. The parliamentary committee of 1872 found that this would "let the public know what they are charged and why they are charged, and give them better means than at present exist for getting unfair charges remedied."

But in the section as proposed there is a provision that ought not to receive our indorsement. It is the provision prohibiting the lowering or decreasing of a rate without five days' notice thereof. I am in favor of prohibiting, and by this amendment I propose to prohibit, any increase in the rate charged by a railroad without a previous notice of fifteen days.

Commercial interests demand that the stability of rates be not disturbed by frequent or sudden increases therein. I would allow railroads—such as so desired—to lower their rates without hinderance or notice, but would force them when once they had made a decrease to maintain it until due notice was given to the merchants and the people of a proposed future increase.

Not only would this amendment benefit the people by preventing sudden increases, but it would also tend to prevent wars of rates, or so-called railroad wars, and thus also benefit transportation companies. Few companies would cut below the cost of transportation if they knew that they could not come back to paying rates without due public notice.

This amendment is a provision which has the sanction of some of the States of this Union, and also of several of the nations of Europe. The State of Kansas requires sixty days' notice before any increase is made. Nimmo in his report favors the publication of rates and prohibition of an increase thereof without due notice. In Belgium, Prussia, and Austria provisions requiring publication of rates are in force. In North Germany it requires a notice of six weeks before an increase in rates is lawful, and in Sweden thirty days is necessary. In England the royal commission of 1867 recommended publication of rates, and the joint committee of 1872, composed of six of the ablest members of each house of Parliament, indorsed and reaffirmed this recommendation in very strong language. In the United States Congress the Senate Committee of 1872 on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard in its report took decided grounds in favor of the publication of rates. It also holds that this publication should precede any increase of rates, but does not seem to deem it necessary to prohibit a decrease thereof without notice.

The committee says:

There is no doubt that a valuable reform in railroad management may be obtained by requiring such publication in this country, especially if accompanied, as in several European countries, with a provision prohibiting an increase of rates without reasonable public notice.

Now all I desire, and all I suggest, and all my amendment will effect is this: it will prevent any railroad that has once fixed its schedule and posted it, as required by the Reagan bill, from making an increase of rates without fifteen days' notice to the public. It can lower them without any notice as much as it wishes, and thus give the people cheaper rates, but must not make an increase without due notice.

I feel certain that this provision preventing railroads from making any decrease in rates without notice is wrong; but that one, such as my amendment, which has as evidence of its value the example of some of the States of this Union, the action of several European countries, the recommendation of the Senate committee which so fully investigated the matter a few years ago, the report of that able Government official who for many years has made internal commerce of the United States his special study and who stands to-day as an authority upon interstate commerce without a peer among the employés of this Government—I mean Joseph Nimmo, jr.—ought to be by this House incorporated in this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I propose to insert thirty instead of sixty, and will make a remark on that amendment. The argument of the gentleman from California is unanswerable as to five days' notice; and giving five days only, opportunity is given to the railroad companies to cut under the rates, and thus defeat competition. If you make it longer you prevent undercutting in proportion to length of notice. You will not get the railroads to carry freights at a less rate for so long a time. Five days' notice is not enough, and I do not think the gentleman from Texas, after hearing what has been said by the gentleman from California, will be inclined to disagree with him.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another point here—a point with reference to the expense thus imposed upon the railroad companies themselves. Congress does not wish, I am satisfied, to put them to an extraordinary and unnecessary expenditure of money. Why, sir, I believe we have about 40,000 post-offices in this country. We have just about as many railroad stations, probably more, and yet under the provisions of this bill requiring a five days' notice you compel the railroad companies to establish printing offices, to employ hundreds and thousands of men to carry out this idea of posting up every five days any increase in the freight rates. I want the House to look upon it in that light.

The gentleman protests that he is not endeavoring to crush out enterprises in railroad construction, or to depress railroad interests, or to depreciate their property; but here is an instance where he forces, absolutely drives them, to a great and useless expenditure of money. I believe we have about 2,200, perhaps more, people employed in the Government Printing Office to do the printing and binding for Congress and the Departments. It requires that number of persons to do it. Now, under the provisions of this section of the bill you will compel the railroads to establish printing offices just as large in order to prepare the schedules which they must post in their offices, and employ men by hundreds to do the work of printing.

But there is still another point to which I wish to invite attention. How will you manage with reference to the Canada railroads? I presume Canada railroads have agents in the city of Chicago and other cities on the lakes seeking business for them. The bill does not require that the rates of these foreign roads should be posted up in any office in the United States where they have agents doing business for them. I do not think, then, that it is fair to our American companies that this great expense and trouble should be incurred by them, and yet the Canada roads not required, where they have their agents in the cities along the lakes or at other points, to do the same. I do not know how, nor do I see why, the railroad companies are to do it; and yet you do not oblige the canal and water-way transportation companies to post up their rates. It is an unjust discrimination against the railroads. I believe the section should be stricken out entirely, or perhaps with the amendments which have been suggested it might be made not so objectionable as to render it our duty to vote against it.

Mr. REAGAN. I allowed the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan and myself to pass without an explanation which is due to the House as well as to myself in reference to one point suggested. My colleagues on this floor will indorse the statement when I say that up to a few years past the Central Railroad of Texas paid the highest dividend of any other road in the Union. I was not aware until informed by the gentleman from Louisiana of the changed condition of affairs brought about by the largely watered stock in recent years. So the gentleman from Michigan has had his joke, and I hope is satisfied.

In reference to the amendment before the House, Mr. Speaker, the provision about the posting up of notices announcing changes of schedules has been fully and seriously discussed by the committee during several Congresses past, and objection has been made to even the requirement of five days' notice. But here, lest I should pass from the subject about which the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be so much alarmed, I wish to say that this five days' notice is a very simple thing after all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania complains as if this was to be done continuously.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That is, five days' notice if they raised their freights.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; but the gentleman speaks as if it was required to be done every five days. It may be done only once a year. It need not be done at all if they do not choose to change their rates.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But in a competition between railroad companies the rates are necessarily changed in a very short time.

Mr. REAGAN. I must decline to be interrupted in the short time that I have. The objections made to this bill by the railroad officers and by the lawyers representing them before the committee was that often five days was too long a time, and my recollection now is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself objected on that ground.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I say what occurred in committee when I state that I objected to the five days upon the very same ground on which I object to it in the House. The gentleman from Texas fails to recollect the facts.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course the gentleman from Pennsylvania objected to anything that places any control or restriction upon the railroads. But I must beg not to be interrupted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I only objected to such things as destroy the railroads.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust the gentleman will not interrupt me and that the Speaker will require order to be preserved upon the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. REAGAN. The point of trouble on that subject to the mind of those gentlemen who appeared before the committee as lawyers and the officers connected with the railroads was not that it endangered anything with reference to the railroads in the United States, but that the requirement of a long notice before a schedule could be changed could not affect the intervening period during which the notice was given, and would give a privilege to certain roads in freight charges. The argument has been made by gentlemen here during this discussion that it gave the Canada railroads an advantage in that respect. The answers which I then made to it I now repeat, that no road managed by men of ordinary business sense would enter into a railroad war for the advantages in freight transportation, covering a period of only five days; and the other was that the Canadian roads which had less rolling-stock, which passed through a poorer country, less transportation facilities, and had to cross the Saint Lawrence River twice, were not capable of competing with our own roads in that respect.

But let us understand what this is. It is a requirement that the railroads shall post up their schedules of rates of charges at certain designated places. It requires that they shall not charge more nor less than the rates posted up until the schedule is changed, and gives them, when they wish to make a change, five days' time within which to change it, so as to post up the new schedule which is to supersede the old one. Such changes are of course at their own option; but there is no obligation resting upon them to make the changes if it is not to their interest to do so.

My opinion is that if the amendment of the gentleman from California and the amendment to it or the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be adopted it does give substantial validity to the argument that it gives advantages to the Canadian roads. And it is because I think it would be unjust to our railroads that I object to it. Kansas may well adopt that rule because there are no outside railroads, so far as I know, competing with the Kansas railroads. There can be no outside railroads competing with them in reference to commerce wholly within the State. Belgium and other countries which have been referred to have their systems of roads. We can not know whether there are competing roads there to be considered in connection with the system of transportation, as we must consider the Canada roads in connection with the great transportation system of the Northern lakes.

I hope neither the amendment nor the amendment to the amendment will be adopted. The five days' notice can work no harm. It will be easy of execution and will protect the people, while it can not harm the railroads.

Mr. BUDD. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. There are already two amendments pending. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I did not offer that as a pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUDD. I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and myself agree as to the necessity for a publication of rates and of public notice being given of any change therein. We disagree as to the number of days and as to what notice should be given. In referring to Belgium and the roads there the gentleman from Texas says that we can not know whether or not there are competing lines that have to be taken into consideration. I thought that the Belgium system established by Leopold I was so well known, and that the competition of private lines with Government lines was so well understood, that all would know that there was competition in Belgium the same as in nearly all the other countries of Europe.

The gentleman from Texas states that his objection to my amendment is that it would give force to the objection made by the attorneys for the railroads before the Committee on Commerce. I have carefully read the arguments before the Committee on Commerce, and I believe I am correct when I say that the objection was based on a lowering of rate and an increase thereof was not mentioned. They stated that if we required five days before a railroad could come down in rates, the Canadian road could reduce one cent or some other amount, and when the five days were up and the United States railroad rates came down to meet the competition, the Canadians could still decrease and for another five days prevent competition and monopolize the trade. But I fail to see in all the arguments any valid objection against the time within which they should prescribe or publish their notices of any increase in rates.

This system has worked well in the old countries. It works well in some of the States of the Union. This amendment is, like other sections of this bill, taken from State statutes. And I state now that I believe the adoption of an amendment requiring notice before an increase of rates is the only kind of notice of change in rates that should be required; that it will prevent wars of rates; that it will neither injure railroad companies nor the people, but will be beneficial to both interests.

That was my object in offering the amendment. I have heard nothing advanced against the correctness of my position except the statement by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that the railroad attorneys before the committee had said that it would prevent competition with the Canadian lines. But, as I understood their objection there, it was against prescribing a time within which they could not lower their rates to meet competition on the Canadian lines. I will print Mr. Depew's objection.

Mr. DEPEW. * * * The schedules are to be posted from one end of the line to the other. But who can tell at what moments the connecting line may repudiate the schedule, and so make absolutely inoperative, so far as this railroad is concerned, from one end of the line to the other? You have got to stick to it for five days. The American Congress steps up and takes the American railway system by the throat, ties its hands behind it, and puts it in the lap of the Canadian system.

* * * * * * * *

Suppose the Pennsylvania and New York Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio all agree upon a schedule. It is posted for five days. It is a remunerative schedule, and gives them a profit. The next day the Grand Trunk says to the country, "We will carry that freight at 5 cents less." Will you tell me what will become of the business of these American companies?

Mr. REAGAN. Just as now; when the five days expire they can reduce the rates, as they do without this law, and as they could do with this law.

Mr. DEPEW. In five days they come down, and they are fixed by your bill for five days more. And the next day again the Grand Trunk lowers and takes the business.

Mr. REAGAN. That makes a railroad war, just as we have now.

Mr. DEPEW. Then we have an unlimited railroad war.

Mr. REAGAN. That is just as it is now.

Mr. DEPEW. But the lines can drive the Grand Trunk into terms now; but under your iron-clad rule they can do no such thing, because they can always have five days the start, and five days' time is decisive usually in the railroad war.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew the pro forma amendment.

I am compelled to recall attention to the point I made the other day. There is no analogy between the conditions in Belgium or any European country, or in any State in this Union, taken by itself, and the condition of the foreign commerce of this country, which is fed by long hauls on railways passing from State to State. What may work very well in a small community or in a single State, or a single European country, fails utterly to be of use when you come to deal with the great foreign commerce of this country, consisting largely in the transportation of grain, provisions, and cotton to our customers in the Eastern Hemisphere. This business is now done by telegraph. There are not five days' interval between the unloading of a ship in the port of New York and the day of her sailing. The rates which can be paid for the transportation of grain from Chicago or Saint Louis to New York, and from New York to Liverpool, have to be determined in less than one day. They have to be determined very often in less than five minutes.

Now this being a question of minutes and not of days, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who lives in the important city of Palestine, a name of which I have heard in my time, although I confess I thought it was an Oriental region—the gentleman steps in and undertakes to say to the merchants of New York and to the commerce which centers there that for five days it shall stand still while the requisite notice of a change of rates is being printed and posted. Here is a new Joshua who has come upon the scene and can bid the sun or the moon to stand still in their heavenly orbits. [Laughter.]

Let me say that I can not understand the position of the gentleman from Texas. The other day when I took the floor he objected to my proceeding for five minutes because the debate had already been exhausted. To-day I find him taking the floor and occupying the time of a gentleman who yields to him and by the grace of the chairman doubling the actual time——

Mr. REAGAN. I was replying to something that occurred after the occasion to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It may have occurred afterward; but the gentleman should have remembered that other people besides himself want to be heard on this floor, and other communities besides the magnificent region of Palestine have a right to have their interests explained here.

And now I find him to-day making the only defense that I ever heard of the abominable reconstruction Legislatures of the Southern States. I have been taught by my Southern friends to abhor the outrages of those unconscionable men who went South and seized upon the sovereign power of those States for their own base uses. Yet the gentleman from Texas has stated here to-day that these unprincipled carpet-baggers for $8,000 a mile could secure and did secure the construction of a great highway through the State of Texas; and this was such an outrage that when the honest men came into power they disregarded the previous bargain and made a new bargain which, by his own admission, has given to these railroads $25,000 to the mile in land—12,000 acres to the mile worth, as the gentleman says, at the minimum $2 an acre—and exempted them from taxation for twenty-one years.

Mr. REAGAN. Twenty-five years.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Well, all I can say is if the gentleman's statement be true those "scalawags" "builded wiser than they knew;" they were men of farsightedness, who understood how to make better bargains for the State whose sovereignty they had stolen than the honest men who came in afterward, and who did not seem to understand the true interests of the State of Texas as well as the "scalawags" had done. If that is the case let us have scalawag government all over this country instead of such legislation as the gentleman proposes, only calculated to embarrass the conduct of business already deranged throughout the length and the breadth of the land. The people are clamorous for the removal of obstructions, not for the imposition of new impediments. Let us have freedom to trade and freedom to move our products under the beneficent law of free competition so regulated as to prevent abuses developed by experience.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am not altogether done. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas would like to shut me off again.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Thank you. I hope some gentleman will yield me five minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. HEWITT, of New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the whole object of the gentleman's bill is to secure low rates. I have been taught that low rates and low prices are secured by competition. I know that the competitive system has reduced the rates of transportation in this counary in ten years, as the gentleman from Illinois said a few moments ago, to one-half and less than one-half what they were before. I know that this process of reduction has gone on, and is going on to-day, so that there is not a trunk line of railroad in the United States that is doing more than earning its running expenses. Now, the gentleman, who says he wants cheap rates and wants to protect the people, and who therefore ought to want competition, proposes by this section of his bill to muzzle competition. In the previous provisions of the bill he has prohibited pooling in order to secure competition. Yet if I have a cargo of wheat which I want to ship to Liverpool and go to a railroad company to obtain a rate that will make the shipment possible, I am met by the clause of this bill which tells me that I can not get a reduced rate in less than five days; that for five days, during which my steamship may be obliged to sail, no railroad company shall compete with any other railroad company and give me a favorable rate. The gentleman from Texas is here as the friend of the people, yet in his efforts to secure what he thinks will benefit commerce he muzzles it so that our ships will sail empty and our ports will be closed up, because we are not allowed to meet the requirements of the commerce of the world.

For one I am tired, I confess it, of this kind of legislation and of this indifference to the plainest facts which ought to be known to every man of business in this country, and even to the gentleman from Texas, who has had before his committee some of the ablest, wisest, and strongest men in the country on the subject of transportation business. From them he might have learned that it is not restriction but freedom that promotes the growth of commerce, and that nowhere is the maxim of laissez faire so beneficial and between the competing companies who have provided the means of transportation in advance of the wants of the country, and the possibility of unreasonable profits or of any profits, unless the business is pooled on a reasonable basis. It is the business of Congress to see that the basis is reasonable, and this can be secured by regulation under the supervision and control of a competent commission, for which I had the honor to report a bill so long ago as the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have always given the gentleman from New York credit for great intelligence and information. But he has revealed the fact that he does not know where Palestine is. Why, sir, the smallest child on my place knows where it is.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Oh, I know where the original Palestine is. There was some sense there. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is very kind. I suppose by that he means to say there is none at the other place.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No; I mean no inference. I let the gentleman speak for himself.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well. The gentleman thinks this bill ought not to be passed because I have become a Joshua and am commanding the sun to stand still. If I could induce him to let his tongue stand still awhile I think the bill would pass. [Laughter.] I have never professed to be a Joshua; never professed to be a prophet; never professed to exercise extraordinary powers. I only ask the passage of a measure of ordinary justice and common honesty.

Why, sir, the gentleman talks about my objecting to hearing the voice of New York. Does he pretend to speak the voice of New York? The Legislature of New York is a better exponent of the opinions of the people of New York than the gentleman who has just addressed the House. That Legislature a few years ago demanded legislation like this.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. For a commission, and I am in favor of a commission.

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad of that. I never heard of it before.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I stated it the other day.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman says that he is for a commission. That is, he wants a commission which means nothing, and which is not intended to mean anything. It is what is used and has been used all the time to antagonize my bill. If the voice of New York, if the voice of the people of New York could be heard to-day, instead of the voice of her money and aggregated capital, a different voice would be heard from that which has been uttered by the gentleman as well as others here upon this floor. [Applause.]

The gentleman talks of this bill inflicting irreparable injury on the commerce of the country. Shall I repeat what I have said so often on this floor? It prohibits the charging of one man more than another for like service. Is it wrong to say, "Gentlemen, you shall be honest; you shall not rob one for the benefit of the other?" What is there wrong in that?

It says no rebate will be allowed to one and denied to another. It says this system of secret and fraudulent methods employed to benefit one class of shippers at the expense of another shall be no longer indulged in, shall be no longer permitted; that to do so is a crime which shall be punished. I appeal to the common sense of all present, to the common sense of every honest heart, if both these provisions are not based on good morals, on sound philosophy, and upon the principles of eternal justice.

It says, sir, that there shall be no pooling. Why, that gentleman comes in with another statement about competition, just as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] did, and yet he knows to-day there are forty roads in one pool managed by pooling managers in New York for the purpose of denying to the people the rights and benefits of competition. Yet they talk about competition. He ought to know that the advocacy of a universal pool has been earnestly presented by Mr. Fink, Mr. Adams, and all the other leading railroad advocates of this country to make one grand monopoly out of all the inferior monopolies of this country.

Yet gentlemen, when I try to present these principles, and one more, which is that they shall not charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul, the shorter haul being included in the longer, tell me it is all wrong. Is it wrong, sir, to prohibit a railroad from charging more for a car-load for one hundred miles than for five hundred, including the one hundred? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to make his argument plausible, broke the shipment into parts of car-loads, and did not make the distinction that the charge should be for like service and like transportation.

These are the four principles involved in this bill, and I undertake to say that the man who means to benefit the interests of this country, who means to be just to his fellow-men, who means to curb the growing power of railroads which have defied us on this floor, who means to protect the people against the rapacity of the railroads, can not object to the provisions of this bill, but must rely on them, notwithstanding the appeals and the audacious declamation we continually hear, and which is miscalled argument, in opposition to this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GREEN. I wish to submit an amendment.

Mr. BUDD. Is the gentleman's amendment an amendment to my amendment?

Mr. GREEN. No; it is an entirely independent proposition.

Mr. BUDD. My amendment is pending, and must, of course, be first voted upon.

Mr. GREEN. I will withhold my amendment, then, for the present.

Mr. BUDD'S amendment was again read.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last word, so I may be allowed to say what I desire on this bill. It is quite impossible for any of us not starting early to be able to give our views on so elaborate a measure as this. I shall not attempt it. It requires great study and care and large examination of statistics; but there are some general principles applying to this bill which we can of course understand, especially if we have been close observers of the trade and commerce between the States. I do not doubt the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate the trade and commerce between the States, but I doubt the wisdom of this bill in many respects. Its main features were before us in the Forty-fifth Congress, when I believe I voted for it, believing then there was some necessity for such a measure; but I believe that necessity has entirely passed away and that it does not now exist, however the gentleman may seek to magnify it.

There is another thing that has some influence on my mind, and that is the fact that the great Commerce Committees of the House of Representatives have had this subject before them from Congress to Congress for years past and have examined it carefully, have examined witnesses, experts and others, and they have with great uniformity of sentiment, since the Forty-fifth Congress at least, reported against this bill and in favor of another.

I know the distinguished gentleman in charge of this measure has seen fit to say that the Commerce Committee was packed in favor of a particular bill, and this same statement has been made more than once on the floor. It might have been so in the beginning, but in response to that it is proper for me to say that it is not true with reference to the Forty-sixth Congress, I know it was not true as to the Forty-seventh Congress, nor do I believe it to be true as to the present Congress; and the gentleman in the heat of debate made a statement which I think he will not insist upon now. I was not present in the House when the statement was made, but I do undertake to refute the assertion that the Committee on Commerce of the Forty-seventh Congress was packed against his bill. He was himself placed at the head of the minority of that committee, because he was chosen properly by the distinguished Speaker of the Forty-sixth Congress to preside over that committee, and chosen largely because of his fitness, his earnestness, and his zeal in his advocacy of this measure. There was put next to him on the committee the present governor of the State of Maryland, Mr. McLane; there was Mr. Ross, of New Jersey, a man of brains and will-power, a man of knowledge and investigation, who examined closely into these subjects. There was the distinguished scholar, the present Senator from the State of Louisiana [Mr. RANDALL L. GIBSON], and so on throughout the list on that side.

On the Republican side there was not a man put on the committee who, with any knowledge on my part, was opposed to the gentleman's bill. I understand the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California, Mr. Page, advocated it; and he was the sole man, after hearing all of the testimony offered, to stand up on the side of the gentleman from Texas in the Forty-seventh Congress in advocacy of the bill.

The trouble in that Congress was the same as the trouble is here, that when the gentleman got all of the facts before the committee, and when they earnestly desired to do the thing they wanted to do, namely, the best thing for the whole country, they preferred another bill to that of the gentleman from Texas; that is to say, they preferred the bill providing for a commission. And it has great weight upon my mind in determining what I shall do here in this connection, although earlier in the history of my career in Congress I have been an advocate of the gentleman's measure and thought it one that would be likely to accomplish good in the direction sought to be accomplished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to have any personal issue upon this floor, but I am not satisfied with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. Knowing that he had voted for the bill in a previous Congress, after his election as Speaker I went to him and told him that while I did not wish to ask any particular favors at his hands, I wanted him, if consistent with his views, to constitute the Committee on Commerce so as to let this measure come before the House and be acted upon by the representatives of the people. He suggested to me, occupying the chair, Mr. Speaker, you now occupy, that I had better write to him on the subject, because in the hurry of business he might forget or overlook the suggestion. I took him at his word and wrote a statement of what I wanted. I desired him, while I did not name any one to go upon the committee, to so constitute it, or that it was my wish that he should constitute the committee so as to allow the measure to come before the House, and in this request I was supported by memorials and petitions from all the sections of the country. When the committee was organized there were thirteen members who were opposed to that bill, and some of them who were its well-known opponents and had voted against it when the gentleman himself voted for it.

I do not like, sir, to speak of these things, because I am not authorized to speak for others, but there was no injunction of secrecy, and it is proper that I should say that the then chairman of the Committee on Commerce told me himself that there was a struggle to keep even me off the committee by the railroad interest. The gentleman from Ohio himself told me that these people quarreled with him because he left me on the committee. What other inference is there that the committee was made up to answer the purpose of men who desired for very particular reasons to have me off that committee, and so stated to the Speaker himself? I have nothing to do with motives. It is not for me to say that the Speaker, in making up the committee, knew the position of the men placed upon it; but the struggle of men to put persons there favorable to the railroad interests, and the struggle to keep me from being a member of the committee, afforded ample evidence of the truth of the position that I took.

I was obliged to the then Speaker for putting me on the committee. The discussion on this bill led to bringing out the remarks which I made and to which reference has been made here, remarks that I do not know under other circumstances I should have made, but after considering all of the facts I do not feel that I would be just to myself to withdraw the statement which I made.

Mr. KEIFER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment and renew it for the purpose of saying a word. I have no desire to pursue this matter in the shape of a personal controversy between the gentleman from Texas and myself, but I am authorized to say for the then chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Forty-seventh Congress that he never made any such statement as the one now made here by the gentleman from Texas to me. As a personal friend of his I say this much.

Mr. REAGAN. It is simply a question of veracity.

Mr. KEIFER. And if he had made it I must say that it would not be true. There never was any such ground for it. I did not remember with great distinctness that the gentleman from Texas had applied to me to pack that committee in the interest of his bill. But if he says that is the case, as he repeats here to-day, I will make no issue with him.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not say that.

Mr. KEIFER. But I will say I did not pack the committee as he says he requested me, either in his interest or in the interest of his bill or in the interest of any railroad or of any person.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNSHEND). Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say the gentleman from Ohio should not use that offensive expression. I did not ask him to pack that committee. I only asked him to let the voice of this House upon that bill be heard.

Mr. KEIFER. I like very much to have a rule that will work both ways. In my absence from the floor a few days ago the gentleman from Texas used the word "packing" in reference to myself, and said a committee had been "packed." Now he asks that that word shall not be applied to himself, when he has just stated that he requested me to make up the committee so that his bill might get before Congress. What does that mean but to pack it?

Now I say nobody asked me to pack that committee. One gentleman did ask me if I was to put the gentleman from Texas on the committee, and I said, "Yes." That is the only thing that happened. I never proposed to pack the committee. The gentlemen who were on that committee were certainly of the best members of that or of any other Congress. Does the gentleman complain of his colleagues on his own side who were on that committee? Were they not of the best men of the country on that side?

Mr. REAGAN. They were all known to be hostile to that bill and had voted against it when the gentleman from Ohio voted for it. The yeas and nays were called and show that fact.

Mr. KEIFER. I can not say whether that is true or not. But a large number who had been put on the committee by the distinguished Speaker of the Forty-sixth Congress were continued on it in the Forty-seventh Congress because of their experience there.

But the misfortune is whenever that bill has passed under a scrutiny of gentlemen who have had time to devote to it, who have had time to gather and collate the facts relating to it and could investigate it by day and by night—whenever that time came, the bill has failed to meet the judgment of a committee. I do not know whether the gentleman claims that the committee of the present Congress is packed. But I am advised there were only one or two other gentlemen on the committee besides the gentleman from Texas who were in favor of his bill after they had heard the whole case.

Mr. REAGAN. That is not correct.

Mr. KEIFER. How many on the committee favored the reporting of your bill?

Mr. REAGAN. I beg to tell the gentleman that I am not on the witness-stand.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Texas undertakes to testify and then declines to state what is the fact. I suppose when a man who has a charge made against him stands mute that is a confession.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish only to say that the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that one man asked him if he was to put me on the committee is not the statement he subsequently made to me. His statement to me was that "they," which meant more than one, had quarreled with him for putting me on the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BUDD, it was not agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I now offer the amendment which I indicated a short time ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

That, within thirty days after the passage of this act the managers of each and every railroad embraced therein shall be required to have provided on each and every passenger train running on their line of road, which now carries a so-called express car, at least one car of like capacity for purpose hereinafter specified, and such car to be under the exclusive control of such road.

That, to the extent of ordinary carrying capacity of such car, every such railroad shall be required, under penalty of forfeiture of one-half of the ascertained and marked value of every package committed to it marked "speed," to take the same to its destination, or to the connecting road making such destination, with the usual celerity of the passenger train, provided that all such packages shall be of class and description usually carried by express companies, and no one package to exceed one hundred pounds in weight.

That, upon arrival at place of destination it shall be stored and cared for until delivered to the consignee in person or upon his written order, and at an additional charge not to exceed 100 per cent. over what would have been ordinary freight rate on same.

That, if destination of package so marked involves transfer to other and connecting railroads, whether owned or operated by the same company or not, such transfer shall be made with reasonable celerity on arrival at connecting point; and the road failing to make such transfer, or the one refusing to receive such package, if in good condition, shall be held responsible for such neglect and liable to aforesaid penalty on account thereof.

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require a passenger train carrying such freight to stop and deliver the same or any part thereof at any depot, station, or point other than one where the road has an accredited agent and where the train stops for ingress or egress of passengers.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, if abatement of monopolistic assumption and extortion be the end in view of the bill under consideration, the amendment just read is certainly germane thereto.

Of all monopolies or close corporations with which we have to deal, there are few so close or with abuses more glaring than the three or four so-called express companies of a national character which enjoy the exclusive right of rapid freight carriage and arbitrary and extortionate charge. Actuated by no genuine or affected sentiment of public spirit, and deterred by no qualms of conscience, their motto seems to be—

The good old rule
Sufficeth them, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

They rarely come in competition with each other, but intrenched in franchise like the robber barons of the Rhine in a kindred era, on their castled crags, they seem by some occult understanding between themselves to map out the country to be despoiled by forced contribution, each taking their slice of territory. This arrangement is more objectionable to the public than a unitized monopoly. It is a good thing for the companies. Demand redress for overcharge or other grievance and the blame is sure to lie with the other company over the border, or if, perchance, discarding this stereotyped excuse, they will give you the equally hackneyed one of heavy bonus to the railroad for monopoly enjoyed. But, Mr. Speaker, the rapidly accumulating and already accumulated colossal fortunes of its chief functionaries and grand factotums completely negative and give the lie to that flippant but plausible pretext for their wholesale petty robberies.

But admit for the nonce that it is even so, and the reason for divorce between the two stands out the more apparent. What right, I ask, has the railroad to take the uttermost farthing of honest exaction from these poor innocents with the implied if not expressed understanding that in consideration therefor these last are to enjoy the exclusive privilege of exacting the very last farthing that they can get out of a reluctant public?

Mr. Speaker, there is no use in mincing terms. The profits of the express company under this delectable system, and they are enormous, when sifted down constitute an aggregation of petty swindles.

Whatever the road can afford to farm out the privilege at, that, with a reasonable percentage added for subagents, &c., is the proper gauge of measure and the aggregate of legitimate charge that it can conscientiously exact from the public if it did what it should do and what it should be made to do—attend to its own business instead of delegating it to another. The proposition covered by the resolution will probably be combated on the ground that patronage is not compulsory; in plainer terms, that no one is compelled to submit to the extortion. It is the India-inked plea of monopolists. As a rule it is fallacious, as it most certainly is here. Take a case for instance: You must have or deliver to another some article by a certain close day. The railroad can not take it. Why? It has barred itself from so doing by specific contract. And so it must come or go, if come or go it does, through the agency of the specially favored lessee yclept the express company.

Is there any limit as to duration of the powers enjoyed? Not the slightest. And there, sir, comes in another most objectionable feature. This privilege is in the nature of an interminable patent. Would you know its origin and the claim upon which it is based? If so, then hearken and I will tell you the tale as it was told me. An individual in the city of Boston conceived the brilliant and original idea of delivering bundles in the surrounding towns in a one-horse wagon. The idea grew, and its author grew, until it has developed into the mammothian, monopolized devil-fish known by its founder's name as "The Adams Express," whose feelers extend across the continent lengthwise and breadthwise, and whose age of life is not to be measured by that of the Republic, but of some succeeding despotism which may perchance arise out of its ruins. Is there not a brief specific limit to other patented ideas of grander conception and more beneficent scope?

We will be met on the threshold here, Mr. Speaker, with the pert retort that "The way is open to competition." But I say, not so.

Let competition dare to enter, as it has time and again, and it will be, as it has been, throttled, squelched, wiped out, obliterated by this pampered ogre as would a lady's lap-dog by a Siberian bloodhound whose dinner it dared invade. Like other monopolies which curse and afflict our land, it is all too powerful to tolerate the rivalry of competition. The public, in their eyes, is a very inconvenient bird. It may be too much for one but is not enough for two.

Doubtless, Mr. Speaker, the intermediary agent saves "the gentlemen of the road" (pardon the equivocal expression; it is not intended literally in the Dick Turpin sense) some trouble and annoyance in handling and delivery. But I submit whether it is fair or just that the public should be subjected to quadruple or quintuple tax for the convenience of the road. They might with equal right dispose of license to carry all freights at option and on terms most suitable to the lessee.

Nay, further; concede the right in the one case, and there is no barrier against farming out to the highest bidder all passenger traffic likewise. Already we see the entering-wedge to this, to some extent, in the parlor and sleeper department. But it is optional so far, I concede, with him who takes passage whether he will avail himself of greater comfort at higher cost. If, however, on precedent established, the sleeping-car company sees fit to buy up the monopoly of all live freight carriage, constructively, bipeds as well as quadrupeds, what recourse or alternative has the ordinary ticket-buyer but to submit to the claim set up and justified under long-established usage in fast-freight carriage and delivery? The right to sell the right to transport a poodle or a parrot, a monkey, a dude, or a donkey implies the kindred right to carry folks at a corresponding increase of rate. Is such intent within the scope or purview of any railroad charter granted outside of Turkey, China, Egypt, or Japan? I simply reiterate, by inference, Mr. Speaker, that if the last is not transferable, neither is the other by any rule of ethics or of equity that can be conceived or laid down. And hence I hold that it is within the scope of our restrictory powers to proclaim null, void, and nugatory in way designed, and to that extent, all such transfers of exclusive rights and arbitrary monopolistic powers.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when five minutes had expired, Mr. DOWD obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. GREEN.]

Mr. REAGAN. I rise for the purpose of moving to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto in one minute.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Texas, before making the motion to close debate, will take time to explain what is meant by the second clause of section 5, which requires that schedules shall be posted at "the different places between which such property shall be carried." Is this intended to require that railroad companies shall post up in every station the rate to every other station in the United States to which freight may be consigned? This, it seems to me, would be impracticable.

Mr. REAGAN. This section, including the clause to which the gentleman refers, is to be construed in pari materia with the remainder of the bill. The bill is designed to regulate commerce between the States. The provision to which the gentleman calls my attention proposes to require railroads to indicate by their schedules the different places between which freight is carried. This every railroad company professes now to do. This provision adds nothing to their present obligation, takes nothing from it. But while they profess to do this, obedience to the rule by which they profess to be governed is the exception. We wish to make compliance with the rule universal. This section is intended to provide an instrument of evidence as well as an instrument of justice, so that the companies shall not charge more or less than their schedule rates, but that equal justice shall be done to all shippers. This provision simply requires the railroads to do exactly what they say they do now.

With reference to the amendment offered by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN], while I regard the question which it presents as one well deserving attention, it would involve at this time the consideration of questions which may operate injuriously upon a measure which has been fully considered. I would therefore be very glad if the gentleman would not press his proposition as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I now move that debate on this section and all amendments to it be closed in one minute.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have been endeavoring to secure recognition in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Time is precious; and if the House will sustain me I propose to press this bill to a conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] that if the motion of the gentleman from Texas be adopted it will merely stop debate, and will not prevent the offering of amendments.

Mr. STRUBLE. Unless the gentleman from Texas should be willing to accept my amendment, I should like to be heard upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman wants to move an amendment, I will give way to him before moving to close debate, so that he may offer his amendment and occupy five minutes in its explanation, and then if necessary a brief rejoinder may be made.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa might be read with the understanding that after the motion to close debate has been adopted the gentleman may be allowed to occupy five minutes if he desires to do so.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. STRUBLE, as follows:

Add to section 5 the following:

"Fourth. It shall be the duty of said person or persons engaged in carrying property, as provided in the first section of this act, to file or cause to be filed, and within fifteen days from and after posting, a copy of each schedule, posted as in this section required, with the clerk of the circuit court of the United States in and for each judicial circuit in or through which any railroad may be operated; and it shall be the duty of said clerk to file and preserve the same as a part of the records of his office."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to close debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto, with the understanding that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] may address the House for five minutes.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN].

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

Mr. REAGAN. I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. If the gentleman from Texas accepts the amendment I do not care to make any remarks upon it.

The amendment of Mr. STRUBLE was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 27 of section 5, after the word "railroads," insert "or pipe lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. In order merely to test the sense of the House I move to strike out this entire section.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 19, noes 61.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "railroads," in the eighth line of the section just read, these words: "or wholly by one pipe line or partly by several pipe lines."

Mr. HOPKINS'S amendment was agreed to.

The seventh section was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons, as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees. Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them, alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any such action, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue, or within one year after the party complaining shall have come to a knowledge of his right of action. And as many causes of action as may accrue within the year may be joined in the same suit or complaint.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move, in line 10, section 7, to strike out the words "three times."

Now, Mr. Speaker, punitive damages under the old rule of the common law I believe are confined to cases where the injury is to the person. I see no reason why in an action to recover damages, simply because of injury to property, there should be awarded more than the actual damage sustained by the person injured. It seems to me there ought to be compensation for injury and no more. This section, as it now stands, provides in all actions against railroad companies by parties injured the sum recovered shall be equal to three times the amount of damage actually sustained. It seems to me this is an invitation to all persons who may be tempted to bring little suits against these corporations simply for the purpose of securing damages. I remember we used to have a great horror that the law gave a moiety to informers. There were many reasons for it, and one of them it seems to me would apply with the same force to this section. It put men as spies into the business of others in order that they might ascertain some infraction of the law so a suit might follow and they might share in the proceeds or result. Where damages are so extraordinary and so disproportionate to loss sustained it would be, it seems to me, a standing invitation to those who so desired to prosecute suits against the railroad companies.

Now, when we have given to a party injured the full measure of damage sustained, taken in connection with the other provisions of this section making it incumbent upon the court to give the party recovering attorney and counsel fees in addition—I say it seems to me that when we have given the party injured the full measure of damage sustained by the injury which he received and, in addition, providing for the payment of attorney and counsel fees, we have done quite enough.

While I am disposed to vote for the bill, I do not believe I will be able to do so if it shall inflict such extraordinary and unreasonable penalties. We ought to treat corporations as we treat others who have rights under the law. Corporations are simply the aggregate of citizens who have combined their capital for some public purpose. When the law visits a penalty on a corporation it simply visits it on the citizens composing it who have contributed their capital to build it up. And while we are considering this question let us look at it in the light of reasonable persons, and if it is possible for Congressmen to be statesmen we might then consider it as statesmen. For these reasons, which I have not time in five minutes to enlarge upon, I hope the amendment which I have moved will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Speaker, that this provision of the bill for the payment of three times the amount of damages sustained by the party injured has grown out of the habitual practice on the part of railroads themselves to protract in every possible way any recovery on the part of those who have been injured. Many of these railroads have been in the habit of protracting litigation so as to deter all people of ordinary means from prosecuting suits to recover damages for losses sustained. If there is any wrong in this matter that wrong has grown out of the acts of railroad corporations themselves.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Indiana had noticed the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] who sits near me, he would have seen in a case actually tried in the courts of Baltimore the ordinary common-law damages were inadequate to meet the injury inflicted and that these triple damages are proper. If they can violate the law and the party injured can only recover actual damages—and we are informed by the gentleman from Maryland the court so held, that no punitive damages can be allowed, only the actual damages—then the railroads would be as safe in violating the law as in obeying it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me a moment——

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will permit me a moment longer. I will then yield to him.

The gentleman from Indiana presents another view of the subject, that this would invite informers. Evidently the gentleman has not contemplated the section; for if he had, with his clear head he would have perceived that the remedy is given to the party aggrieved, and not to the informer.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Texas misapprehended my statement entirely. I simply said that it was analogous to the law that allowed moieties and of which complaint was made.

Mr. REAGAN. But I understood that the gentleman claimed it would invite informers.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No; I knew that there was nothing in this section to induce informers.

Mr. REAGAN. Well, I was afraid the argument would be so understood, and I desired to set the matter right at the proper point.

Mr. Speaker, this question of giving triple damages is a very common one as a statutory remedy against torts such as this is intended to provide against. It is common both in English and in American State courts to give triple damages for willful wrongdoing, and that is all we propose. We propose to tell these gentlemen that they must obey the law, and if they do not we will put penalties upon them which will compel obedience.

If the gentleman from Indiana does not wish to make any further remarks I will move to close debate upon this section.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to have a few moments longer, and for that purpose move to strike out the last word.

If it be true, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, that triple damages may be allowed in some cases, it seems to me, to say the most of this provision that can be said of it, that it ought not to be an inflexible rule. Here in every case in which there is a willful act that constitutes a violation the court must award damages equal to three times the amount of the injuries sustained. Now, in addition to the invitation to litigation contained in this section, it seems to me to be even intended to be a terror to the companies themselves, who may be afraid even to refuse to settle without bringing to the attention of the courts the question of their legal rights, lest they may be mulct in three times the damages, for every act against the statute would be willful, and its being willful, the violation would be construed to be willful also.

So I would not complain so much if it allowed this measure of damages to be fixed by the court in its discretion, so it might be applied to proper cases; but here it is inflexible and admits of no exception. If it were stated to be damages in the discretion of the court, I should not object to that.

I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have had some little experience in litigation with railroad companies, and I want to say to him that the citizen is not in very much danger when he joins issue in the courts and before a jury with a railroad company—not in much danger. I have never known the corporation to succeed in any case where they should not have succeeded, and I have known many instances in which they have been defeated where I think under a due administration of law they should have been successful.

I want to state another fact, that there is no danger in these cases where a conviction follows that the damages will not be the full measure of the injury sustained. There will be no cutting down, no paring by the jury in the interest of the railroad company. If they prove damages and the amount be $10 or $10,000 the jury and the courts will award every penny of it, and there is no necessity for this provision in this bill.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move, pending the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, to close debate in one minute on this section and the pending amendment.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all the words in line 18, after the word "injured," and also the word "fees," in line 19, and insert the words "a sum to be determined by the court in its discretion, but not to exceed his reasonable attorney's fees."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Just a word now.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed upon the amendments and the section.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wanted to leave, inasmuch as there will be three times the damages awarded, the attorney's fees in the discretion of the court.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 36, noes 54.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUDD. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 10 and 11 the words "equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained," and insert instead thereof the words "equal to the amount of the damages so sustained, and in case such violation were willful, the person or persons so sustaining damage shall be entitled to judgment for three times the damages actually sustained."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the seventh section and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk. What I desire to insert is the sixth section of the bill which was reported by the committee. I propose to strike out the section in the substitute bill and insert the section reported in the committee's bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I was taking the one minute.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to any person injured for the actual damages caused by such violation, which may be recovered in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction. The court before which any such action is tried, if it shall be found that the violation was willful or continued after the notice provided by the tenth section of this act, shall make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees, and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 14, noes 50.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to call attention to the fact that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. O'NEILL, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN, as tellers.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I did not call for a quorum. I merely called attention to the fact that a quorum had not voted.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STRUBLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "him," in the thirty-fourth line, the following words: "For violating any of the provisions of this act."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 51 and 52 amend by striking out the words "or within one year after the party complaining shall have come to a knowledge of his right of action."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an addition to the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 7 the following:

"And any circuit or district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the persons shall have the power, upon application of any person or persons, firms, railroads, or other corporations or associations, alleging undue and unjust discrimination against a person in violation of the provisions of this act, to issue writs of mandamus against such person, commanding such person to move and transport freight, or to furnish facilities for transportation for the party applying for the writ, upon such terms and in such manner as shall seem just and proper to the court in order to prevent any undue or unjust discrimination against the relator. The proceedings shall be as in other cases of mandamus; and in cases of urgent necessity or involving the transportation of perishable goods the writs of alternative mandamus may be made returnable forthwith: Provided, That no writ or peremptory mandamus shall issue under this act until the relator shall have given security, in such sum as shall be named by the court, to pay the defendant the proper and legal charges for the services required to be performed by the writ aforesaid: And provided further, That the remedy herein given by writ of mandamus shall be cumulative, and shall not exclude or interfere with the other remedies herein provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Add to section 7 as follows:

"No cause brought under this act in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any United States court."

The question being taken on the proposed amendment, there were—ayes 36, noes 21.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. O'NEILL.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 32.

Mr. SMALLS. I insist upon a quorum, inasmuch as this amendment is in the interest of the Jim Crow car.

The tellers resumed the count and reported the result.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report ayes 111, noes 55. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRUMM. I call for the yeas and nays.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. BRUMM. I have called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point that the gentleman called for the yeas and nays too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the demand for the yeas and nays until after other business had been transacted.

Mr. BRUMM. I asked for the yeas and nays before the report was made from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. REAGAN. But the gentleman did not call for the yeas and nays before the Chair had announced the result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that he called for the yeas and nays before the title to the enrolled bill was read. The practice has always been in such cases to take the gentleman's statement.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman says that he called for the yeas and nays before the title of the enrolled bill was read. But the point is that he did not call for them until the Speaker had announced the result.

The SPEAKER. It is usual when the Chair announces the vote that then gentlemen rise and demand the yeas and nays, and the Chair thinks the call for the yeas and nays was made in time.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 39 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 88, not voting 110; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MCCOMAS, by unanimous consent the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. KELLEY, on all political questions, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. GOFF, for this day.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. HOLTON, for this day.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. POLAND, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. BISBEE, on all political questions, for the remainder of this day. Mr. MOULTON would vote for the Reagan bill.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. KEAN, on the Reagan bill. If present, Mr. JONES would vote "ay" and Mr. KEAN "no."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, with Mr. PARKER, on the Reagan bill.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. GREENLEAF, on the Reagan bill, for the day.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. CHACE, on the interstate commerce bill, for the remainder of this day. Mr. BLANCHARD would vote for the Reagan bill and Mr. CHACE against it.

Mr. HURD with Mr. HATCH, of Michigan.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall willfully do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $1,000.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by striking out in the last line of the section just read the word "less" and inserting "more;" so as to make it read, "shall be fined not more than $1,000."

Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is to provide a maximum instead of a minimum punishment for a violation of the provisions of this bill. This bill applies not only to directors and managers of railroad corporations, but to agents and employés as well. So that any station agent who may ship or permit to be shipped property for which more than the reasonable cost of transportation is exacted can, under this section, be fined in any sum not less than $1,000. He might be fined $10,000 or $50,000, but the penalty can not be less under the terms of this bill than $1,000. When we reflect, Mr. Speaker, that for an error of judgment this penalty may be visited upon the officers or agents of railroad corporations, we can see at once that instead of fixing a minimum punishment we should fix a maximum. As stated by the gentleman from Indiana awhile ago, in a contest between a railroad company and an individual the juries of the country will always do justice to the individual, and I think it would be a great mistake indeed to permit juries, without any restraint, to impose a penalty in any amount that they might determine.

I repeat that I think there ought to be a maximum penalty. Under the bill as it now stands, if its provisions be violated by an agent who simply carries out a schedule furnished him by his superiors, he is liable to a penalty which in no instance can be less than $1,000. Perhaps $1,000 is not enough for the maximum penalty; but it is certainly more than the minimum penalty ought to be.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] will consent to make the maximum penalty $2,000, I will not object to his amendment.

Mr. CLARDY. The gentleman from Texas suggests that my amendment be modified so as to fix the maximum penalty at $2,000 instead of $1,000.

Mr. REAGAN. In that form I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. CLARDY as modified, so as to make the last line of the section read "shall be fined not more than $2,000," was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property wholly within one State, and not shipped from or destined to some foreign country or other State or Territory; nor shall it apply to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to make the formal amendment to the last section just read by striking out the last word. During the excitement growing out of the granger laws in the West, and just after the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining their constitutionality, I was in the constitutional convention in Georgia in 1877, in which many measures connected with railroads were discussed. I was so unfortunate then as to be in a minority. I believed that any rigid rule in regard to railroad tariffs or rates, any rigid, unbending rule as to their management, would work evil and only evil to the people. The Legislature of my State, which met in 1879 to carry out the action of the constitutional convention, started upon a measure as radical as this. With the experience of only those two years that Legislature, upon calm consideration, receded from the measure which was first contemplated and gave us a commission. Whatever may be the defects of such arrangement, it has a great advantage in flexibility. While there is much to be said in favor of legislation on the subject of railroads, there is much more to be said against any procrustean bed upon which all must be made to lie, though it may require the knife to make them fit.

I know the wrongs and oppressions of the railroads, but I know that the people need railroads, and that every additional burden or expense put upon them must sooner or later come out of the pockets of the public. I know besides that this bill contains the first effort ever made by Congress to legislate as to the transportation of passengers on land, except in the civil-rights bill, which has lately been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I can not in five minutes give fully my reasons for voting against this bill; but I was unwilling to vote without declaring that while I differ, with deference and reluctance, from my friends on this floor, I shall feel compelled to vote against this proposed legislation.

Mr. REAGAN. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] misapprehends the character of this bill. He speaks of it as a bill to regulate railroad freights—as a "procrustean bed"—implying that it is an arbitrary measure. One of the greatest troubles I have had even with the friends of legislation in this direction has been to get them to understand that this is not a bill to regulate freight rates, that it does not undertake to prescribe rates for the transportation of freight. I know the difficulties which would attend any measure attempting to prescribe rates of freight. I am persuaded that no law fixing rates of freight could be made to work with justice either to the railroads or to the public; and I have intended from the beginning to avoid that difficulty. I have sought to secure the passage of legislation which would strike down the greatest and most manifest abuses of the railroads in the exercise of their monopoly powers. They have a complete monopoly of the business done upon their several lines; there is no permission to others to compete with them for the carriage of freights upon those lines.

I simply propose to say they shall not discriminate in freight rates, but shall be just and equal in their charges to the public who have given them their charters and the right to charge at all; that they shall not allow rebate to swindle one class for the benefit of another; that they shall not deprive the public of the benefit of competition by pooling the freights of different railroads; that they shall not charge more for fifty miles than they would for five hundred miles, including that fifty miles in the distance. That is simply to strike down the exercise of the monopoly powers of railways, in which they inflict the most manifest and constant injuries upon the public.

What procrustean bed is there in that? I have not undertaken to say they shall charge this or that price as to freights.

The difficulty with gentlemen in considering the bill is that they can not keep out of their minds the arguments of the railroad lawyers and lobbyists, who are continually harping upon it that this bill establishes arbitrary rates of freight. It does no such thing. It carefully guards against that, simply intending to prevent the most manifest abuse against the public and control the monopoly powers of these corporations.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted. [Cries of "Vote."]

Mr. HAMMOND, by unanimous consent, withdrew his formal motion.

Mr. PERKINS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That to aid in executing and carrying out the provisions of this bill there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, no more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party, and of whom one shall be of experience in the law and one of experience in railroad business, who shall be collectively known as the commission of interstate commerce of the United States. One of said commissioners shall hold his office for the term of two years, one for the term of four years, and the other for the term of six years, to be respectively designated by the President, and thereafter said commissioners shall be appointed for the term of six years; and a commissioner appointed to any vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Any one of said commissioners may be removed by the President for cause, but not otherwise. Said commissioners shall devote their whole time and abilities to the duties of their office, and shall not accept or engage in any office or employment inconsistent with the provisions of this act. If either commissioner, after his appointment, shall be, or shall become by inheritance or operation of law, pecuniarily interested in any railroad or railroad security, he shall, within thirty days, divest himself of such interest; and upon his failure to do so, or upon his voluntarily becoming interested in any such railroad or railroad security, his office shall become vacant. No commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest whatever. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable like the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States: Provided, That before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall, in addition to the oath required of them by law, take and subscribe to an oath that they are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership or earnings of any railroad company whatsoever.

SEC. 12. That the said commission shall exercise only the powers by this act conferred. Said commission may appoint a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep a full and faithful record of the proceedings of said commission, and otherwise to assist the members thereof in the performance of their duties, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; and also one accountant at an annual salary of $2,500. The Secretary of the Interior, at the request of said commission, may also furnish the commission such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as they may request and he shall deem proper. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by said commissioners, or their employés under their orders, shall be allowed them, for which vouchers shall be rendered. The commissioners, their experts and clerks, may pass and repass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge, whenever engaged in the performance of their duties under the provisions of this act, but neither shall accept any other pass, gratuity, or favor whatever from any railroad company.

SEC. 13. That any person complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any railroad company or person in violation or contravention of this act may, in addition to the remedies hereinbefore provided, apply to said commission by petition in writing, which shall briefly state the subject of such complaint. If the petition is signed by any board of trade or other commercial body, or, when signed by an individual, if it bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States, or of any district or county attorney, or officer corresponding thereto, of any State or Territory, that he has examined the facts and in his opinion the complaint is well founded, the commission is hereby required to entertain and investigate the same. In all other cases the commission shall decide whether or not the petition ought to be proceeded with. The commission may, if they think fit, before requiring or permitting any formal proceedings to be taken on any petition, communicate the same to the railroad company against whom it is made, so as to afford them an opportunity of making such observations or taking such action thereon as they may think fit. The commission shall have power, and in a proper case is required, to cause a copy of the petition to be served upon the railroad company complained against, and to issue a notice requiring such company to appear before the commission and answer the said petition. The answer shall be in writing. After the answer is filed it shall then be lawful for the commission, if it shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper, all such inquiries into matters of fact as may be deemed necessary to enable the commission to form a just conclusion in respect of the matters of said petition. All the proceedings before said commission shall be directed by and under general orders, which shall secure to all persons interested reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence adduced before it, or by the report of any person to whom the commission may have referred the inquiry, or any part thereof, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in contravention or violation of this act by any railroad company or person so upon due and proper notice proceeded against, it shall be the duty of such commission to make and record its report in writing in respect of any such contravention or violation of this act, which report shall comprise and embrace the findings of the commission upon and in respect of all questions of fact in issue or involved in such proceedings. Within a reasonable time, not to exceed twenty days, after such report and findings are made by the commission, it shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon or delivered to the railroad company so found to have violated this act, to which shall be appended a notice to be issued by said commission to such company forthwith to cease and desist from such violation; and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which the act complained of occurred another copy of such report, findings, and notice.

SEC. 14. That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction, requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act. Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard, by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested. Such court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding. In any case where the court shall adjudge that the violation of this act by any company has been willful, or continued after notice to desist therefrom, the court may award to any party injured such a gross sum by way of costs as will reimburse all his costs, charges, expenses, counsel fees, and disbursements, to be paid by such company.

SEC. 15. That the commission may make, and from time to time amend, such general orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including all forms for proceeding, notices and the service thereof, and for the prescribing, directing, or regulating any matters authorized by this act. All the proceedings before said commission shall be upon reasonable notice to all parties interested, and such forms shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear and be heard in person or by attorney.

SEC. 16. That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned, have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, and shall also have the powers following:

(a) They may, by subpœna or order to be served by a person by them authorized, require the attendance of witnesses, and of all such persons as they think fit to call before them, or before any person by them authorized to prosecute an inquiry.

(b) They may require the production of all books, papers, and documents relating to any matter before them, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States.

(c) Either of them may administer oaths and affirmations.

SEC. 17. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general session shall be held and its records and archives be deposited. Whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, or one of the persons named in the eleventh section hereof, or by any person specially appointed by the commission, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact, and may specially delegate to the officer or person conducting such inquiry such powers to that end as are by this act conferred upon the commission and may be deemed necessary. Every vote and official act of either of the commissioners shall be entered of record. The commission may conduct its proceedings in such a manner as will most conduce to the dispatch of business and to justice; they may sit together or separately, and either in private or public, but any proceeding before them shall be public upon the request of either party thereto; and a majority of said commission may determine any question submitted. The commission shall prescribe a railroad year, and a system of reports covering said year to be rendered by railroad companies; examine the books and accounts of said companies at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to said companies are enforced; furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads in regard to the tariffs of fares and freight, or the accounts of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient; and make an annual report of their doings to Congress on or before the 1st day of January of each year.

SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Interior shall provide suitable offices and a room for the public sessions of the commission in the city of Washington. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees as witnesses in the Federal courts, and depositions de bene esse and under commission may be taken to be used before the commission in the same manner and upon the same conditions as in such courts. The salaries and expenses of the commission shall be provided for, audited, and paid in the same manner as the salaries of judges and other judicial expenses.

SEC. 19. That in the construction of this act the phrases "railroad corporation" and "railroad company" shall be held to be synonymous, and to signify a corporation which either owns or operates a railroad as aforesaid, and shall include receivers, lessees, and trustees operating railroads.

SEC. 20. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the uses and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1885, and the intervening time anterior thereto.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order on that amendment. As read it is a copy of sections 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 18, and 19, which have been voted down by the House.

Mr. PERKINS. It is perhaps true that some of the sections I offer here as an amendment to the bill supported by the gentleman from Texas are the same as those contained in the bill heretofore rejected, but there are other provisions and sections materially different; and as to them it seems to me the point of order can not be sustained, and if the point of order can not be sustained as to them, then these sections to which the point of order is interposed can not be sustained, because they are necessary to the efficacy and effect of the bill. I desire to say this amendment is not offered for the purpose of embarrassing or interfering at all with the legislation contemplated by the gentleman from Texas. Instead of that it seems to me that this amendment should be accepted in order to give additional advantages and opportunities through which to secure the relief desired by all.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is not debating the question of order.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not in any way impinge upon or conflict with the provisions of the bill already considered and acted upon by the House. We of the West know how important it is to have legislation upon this subject——

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the question of order, but is discussing the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas must confine his remarks to the question of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I was attempting to do so, and in connection with that was suggesting why in my opinion the point of order should not be insisted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this amendment is offered as an entirety. It must be one amendment, and the vote taken in the House on striking out what was known as the commission part of the bill, reported from the Committee on Commerce, was a vote upon one single proposition, although it embraced many sections, just as the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas embraces many sections.

Mr. PERKINS. And I offer this as an entirety.

The SPEAKER. It must, of course, be so offered.

Mr. PERKINS. And you will perceive on examining it that it is quite different in some important principles from the commission part of the bill of the Committee on Commerce which was rejected by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that while a large part of the proposed amendment is identical with some of the provisions stricken out by the vote of the House, yet it is not exactly the same proposition on which the House voted at that time.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to close debate in one minute upon the pending section and the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order and entertains the amendment.

The gentleman from Texas now moves to close debate upon the pending section and amendment in one minute.

Mr. PERKINS. But I believe I have the floor, Mr Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had the floor in response to the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PERKINS. But can the gentleman from Texas take me off the floor before I have exhausted my right to discuss the amendment under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Kansas was recognized for debate upon the merits of the amendment, but simply upon the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Texas by giving ten minutes for debate instead of five.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that it will save time by allowing debate——

Mr. REAGAN. This subject has been already fully discussed in the House. It is important that we should proceed with the consideration of the bill. It is growing late now and I can not yield further time for discussion.

Mr. PETERS. I only suggest that the gentleman will save time by giving time for debate.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman wants to filibuster he can place himself in that attitude before the country,

Mr. PETERS. I do not like to be charged with filibustering, for I have not done any so far.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not intend to yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. But when the Chair had decided the question of order the gentleman from Texas immediately took the floor and made his motion.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas states that he did not intend to yield the floor. The gentleman from Texas had the right to take the floor of course on the point of order even while the gentleman from Kansas had the floor, and the gentleman from Kansas says that he did not intend to yield the floor and thereby waive his right to discuss his amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman did not take the floor for the purpose of discussing the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I had the floor when the point of order was made and did not yield it except for the point of order; not for a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas took the floor on his amendment, which was sent to the desk. When it was read, the gentleman from Texas immediately rose and made the point of order and some remarks upon it. Thereupon the gentleman from Kansas took the floor on the point of order. In the course of his remarks the gentleman from Texas claimed that he was not confining himself to the point of order, and the Chair called his attention to that fact. When he had completed his remarks the Chair decided the question of order, and the gentleman from Texas took the floor and submitted his motion.

Mr. REED. Then the gentleman from Kansas was entitled to the floor, and he says he did not yield it. After the point of order was decided he had the floor on his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen had not the floor to discuss the merits of the amendment but the question of order, and had completed his remarks and resumed his seat when the gentleman from Texas rose and made his motion.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Kansas says that he had not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman for debate after the point of order upon the amendment was overruled and before the gentleman from Texas moved to close debate.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Kansas was on the floor at that time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he was on the floor after the question of order was decided, and before the gentleman from Texas made his motion to close debate, the Chair can only say that he did not see the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. I was not only on the floor but I was attempting somewhat to discuss the merits of the amendment, as the Chair will remember.

The SPEAKER. But that was before the Chair had decided the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I had not abandoned the floor at all.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kansas took the floor and offered an amendment. The point of order was made on that. In discussing the point of order the gentleman from Kansas entered into a discussion of the merits of the proposition and his attention was called by the Speaker to the fact. Subsequently the Speaker decided the point of order in his favor, and I took the floor at that time and moved to close debate.

The SPEAKER. That was the observation of the Chair. The gentleman from Kansas had completed his remarks on the question of order and had resumed his seat, and thereupon the Chair decided the question of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I was on my feet when the decision was made.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman from Kansas was on his feet from the beginning.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That does not cover the whole point involved here. The rules of the House under which we act permit that when a gentleman offers an amendment he can discuss it five minutes. Now, when the gentleman from Kansas offered his amendment the moment that the points of order connected with it were disposed of he had a right to go on and discuss his amendment for those five minutes. The gentleman from Texas can move that at the end of five minutes debate shall close, but he can not move now that it shall close in one minute, because, under the rules, the gentleman from Kansas had the right to speak for five minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. To obviate further discussion as to this I will move to close debate in five minutes, with the understanding that those five minutes shall be occupied by the gentleman from Kansas.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN, as modified, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, as I have already suggested in the amendment I have offered, I am moved by no desire or interest to embarrass or hinder the proposed legislation to which for so many days we have given the attention of this House.

The importance of this legislation I believe is appreciated by all, and particularly by those of us who live upon the prairies of the West, far removed from the seaboard and the advantages of cheap water transportation. Hence, we have watched this debate with interest and examined with care the amendments offered from time to time to the bill reported by the committee to this House for its consideration. We have seen these great corporations—these handmaids to commerce and adjuncts to modern civilization—grow and increase in number until there are more than twelve hundred of them extending and ramifying their interests and their 125,000 miles of road into almost every community and hamlet in the land, carrying blessings and privileges to the people only to be secured by railroad communication.

We have learned of the seven billion of dollars invested in these great enterprises, and know of the two million of men given employment by them, and have witnessed the wonderful transformations worked by these agencies and instrumentalities, and while we have learned and know all this, we have felt their iron heel, and know how ruthlessly at times they ride down statutes, defy courts, and outrage the rights of individuals and communities; and knowing all this, Mr. Speaker, we want legislation that will be remedial, effective, and yet just to all. We would not by the strong arm of the Government take from these railroad companies that which is necessary to their vitality and usefulness—the legitimate prerogatives of common carriers—nor from their stockholders their accummulations and earnings; and neither would we permit them, in consequence of more ineffective legislation, to become stronger than the Government which gives them the right to live—chariots of Juggernaut, to accept the plaudits and peans of the people served, but to crush with its iron wheels those who complain of their ruinous extortions and unjust discriminations or have the effrontery to question their high-handed measures.

I am not unmindful of the fact that competition is doing much to relieve us of the wrongs we have suffered in the years gone; nor am I unmindful of the fact that these great corporations give to the people of the United States the cheapest and the best railroad service to be found in the entire circuit of the sun, but I am not of the opinion, apparently possessed by some gentleman upon the floor of this House, that competition will remedy all the evils we suffer, and hence it is that we favor legislation—healthy, vigorous, and effective legislation; and hence I hope this bill will be amended so that we of the West can sustain it. I know of communities in the West that almost bankrupted themselves in aid to what promised to be a competing line of railroad, but when the supposed advantage was secured, and hope was high with the anticipations of cheap transportation for the future, a pool was formed between the new and the old roads, and all competition was destroyed, and the towns lavish in their contributions to the road promising them competition were not only disappointed in their expectations but witnessed the growth of new towns brought into existence somewhat by their aid to the new corporation where advantages and rates were given, not given to the town with the two roads or more, because at the new town no pool or combination existed.

The amendment I offer does not in any way impair or impinge upon the provisions of the bill so earnestly advocated by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, but gives to the public and to the individual sufferer greater remedies and additional advantages. My amendment leaves in full force the common law remedy, the effective provisions, if any such there are, in the gentleman's bill, and the additional benefits of a non-partisan, thoroughly accomplished, and I believe honest commission.

In my judgment this House should learn something from other legislative bodies and from the experience of others, and we know that this railroad legislation has proven abortive and ineffective I think in every instance in those States where by arbitrary statutes and inflexible rules they have attempted to remedy existing evils, instead of by the wise provisions of a commissioners' bill.

In the few minutes allotted me I can not attempt to speak of the many benefits to accrue from the aid furnished by the commissioners. Many of them have already been suggested in this debate, but one of the most important is the information it will furnish to the man or community that is compelled by the arrogance and continued wrong of the railroad company to go into court to secure a correction of the evil. Without this amendment the litigant with the company, as of the common law, will be compelled to find and secure his testimony as best he can, largely dependent upon the servants and employés of the railroad companies—the camp of the enemy—for his most important information. But with my amendment a thoroughly competent and dispassionate tribunal is furnished and delegated with full power to investigate the grievance and secure the information, and with it the litigant will be able to show the wrong, if wrong there is, of which he complains, and secure the justice denied him by the obstinacy of the railroad company and under other circumstances almost unattainable.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, with my amendment the bill will be a potent, effective, remedial measure, but without it a brutum fulmen, not honored even by the gentleman from Texas and not responsive to the desires and interests of the people, and hence I trust the amendment may prevail.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move to close debate on the amendment and section under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It is a substitute for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order at a later stage.

Mr. HAMMOND. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read Mr. HAMMOND'S proposed amendment, as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment the following:

"Provided, however, That the commissioners herein provided for shall not be appointed until the 5th day of March, 1885."

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House do now adjourn. But before the question is put upon that motion I ask that, in accordance with the suggestion of a number of gentlemen, the bill, as far as it has been matured, be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

The words stricken out are printed in brackets, and the additions to the bill are printed in Italics.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad or by pipe line or lines from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is by him or them charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. All charges for such services shall be reasonable. And any person or persons having purchased a ticket to be conveyed from one State to another, or paid the required fare, shall receive the same treatment and be afforded equal facilities and accommodations as are furnished all other persons holding tickets of the same class without discrimination. But nothing in this act shall be construed to deny to railroads the right to provide separate accommodations for passengers as they may deem best for the public comfort and safety, or to relate to transportation relating to points wholly within the limits of one State: Provided, That no discrimination is made on account of race or color; and that furnishing separate accommodations, with equal facilities and equal comforts, at the same charges, shall not be considered a discrimination. Nor shall any railroad company or its officers charge to or receive from any person who is to be conveyed from one State or Territory into another any sum exceeding 3 cents per mile for the distance to be traveled by such person. And all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage, in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights of different and competing railroads [by dividing] or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter, on any one railroad or pipe line; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road or pipe line in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads or pipe lines as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

Fourth. It shall be the duty of said person or persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act to file, or cause to be filed, and within fifteen days from and after posting, a copy of each schedule posted, as in this section required, with the clerk of the circuit court of the United States in and for each judicial circuit in or through which any railroad may be operated; and it shall be the duty of said clerk to file and preserve the same as a part of the records of his office.

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, or wholly by one pipe line or partly by several pipe lines, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons, as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees. Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them, alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any deposition or evidence or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any such action, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue, or within one year after the party complaining shall have come to a knowledge of his right of action. And as many causes of action as may accrue within the year may be joined in the same suit or complaint. And any circuit or district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the persons shall have the power, upon application of any person or persons, firms, railroads, or other corporations or associations, alleging undue and unjust discrimination against a person in violation of the provisions of this act, to issue writs of mandamus against such person, commanding such person to move and transport freight or to furnish facilities for transportation for the party applying for the writ, upon such terms and in such manner as shall seem just and proper to the court in order to prevent any undue or unjust discrimination against the relator. The proceedings shall be as in other cases of mandamus; and in cases of urgent necessity or involving the transportation of perishable goods the writs of alternative mandamus may be made returnable forthwith: Provided, That no writ or peremptory mandamus shall issue under this act until the relator shall have given security, in such sum as shall be named by the court, to pay the defendant the proper and legal charges for the services required to be performed by the writ aforesaid: And provided further, That the remedy herein given by writ of mandamus shall be cumulative, and shall not exclude or interfere with the other remedies herein provided.

No cause brought under this act in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any United States court.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall willfully do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not [less] more than [one] two thousand dollars.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property wholly within one State, and not shipped from or destined to some foreign country or other State or Territory; nor shall it apply to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask that my proposed amendment, which is a substitute for the bill, be printed along with it.

There was no objection.

The amendment proposed by Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall appoint five commissioners to be styled commissioners of interstate commerce, whose salaries shall be $6,000 per annum each, and whose duties shall be to hear complaints of shippers, and who shall make annual reports each fiscal year to the President of the United States, and for whom sufficient office-room shall be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, and who shall have a clerk at the annual salary of $3,000, and an assistant clerk at the annual salary of $2,000, and a messenger at a salary of $75 per month."

SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall report, so that it may be submitted to the Forty-ninth Congress in printed form upon the day of its assembling and organization, the propriety of requiring from all railroad companies engaged in carrying merchandise as interstate-commerce carriers, publicity of all rates; ample public notice of change of rates, publicity and uniformity of all rebates, contracts with shippers for rates or rebates to be in writing and open to public inspection and the inspection of officials; publicity and uniformity of the accounts and reports of all interstate railroads and of interstate business of all other railroads; regular and unreserved reports of earnings and expenses, with penalties for falsification; no concessions in rates to large shippers, except to such as represent the actual merchandise saving in the expense of hauling large shipments over small shipments, such concessions to be in writing and invariably made known to the public; every pool or combination between interstate railroads or railroads doing an interstate business to be made in public, and their terms posted at every point interested.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire also to have printed in the RECORD a bill which I propose to move as an instruction in connection with a motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The proposed motion of Mr. HEPBURN to recommit with instructions is as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to report the following bill as a substitute at an early day, and when so reported the said substitute shall occupy the same status for consideration as the bill now being considered.

A bill to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons so engaged as aforesaid directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of compensation or reward than is by him or them charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling the same under substantially similar circumstances; and all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being considered as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them, which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads; and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 6. That any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to any person injured for the actual damages caused by such violation, which may be recovered in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction. The court before which any such action is tried, if it shall be found that the violation was willful, or continued after the notice provided by the tenth section of this act, shall make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees, and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses.

SEC. 7. That any corporation or person violating this act is guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each violation. The courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all prosecutions arising under this section. It shall be the duty of district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute to effect criminal proceedings for all such violations. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the first section of this act.

SEC. 8. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nine commissioners, one from each judicial circuit in the United States, who shall be collectively known as the commission of interstate commerce of the United States, and shall be charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect of interstate commerce. Three of said commissioners shall hold their office for the term of two years, three for the term of four years, and three for the term of six years, to be respectively designated by the President, and thereafter said commissioners shall be appointed for the term of six years; and a commissioner appointed to any vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Any one of said commissioners may be removed by the President for cause, but not otherwise. Said commissioners shall devote their whole time and abilities to the duties of their office, and shall not accept or engage in any office or employment inconsistent with the provisions of this act. If either commissioner, after his appointment, shall be, or shall become by inheritance or operation of law, pecuniarily interested in any railroad or railroad security, he shall, within thirty days, divest himself of such interest; and upon his failure to do so, or upon his voluntarily becoming interested in any such railroad or railroad security, his office shall become vacant. No commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest whatever. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable like the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States: Provided, That before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall, in addition to the oath required of them by law, take and subscribe to an oath that they are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership or earnings of any railroad company whatsoever.

SEC. 9. That the said commission shall exercise only the powers by this act conferred. Said commission may appoint a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep a full and faithful record of the proceedings of said commission, and otherwise to assist the members thereof in the performance of their duties, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; and also one accountant, at an annual salary of $2,500. The Secretary of the Interior, at the request of said commission, may also furnish the commission such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as they may request and he shall deem proper. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by said commissioners, or their employés under their orders, shall be allowed them, for which vouchers shall be rendered. The commissioners, their experts and clerks, may pass and repass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge, whenever engaged in the performance of their duties under the provisions of this act, but neither shall accept any other pass, gratuity, or favor whatever from any railroad company.

SEC. 10. That any person complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any railroad company or person in violation or contravention of this act may, in addition to the remedies hereinbefore provided, apply to said commission by petition in writing, which shall briefly state the subject of such complaint. If the petition is signed by any board of trade or other commercial body, or, when signed by an individual, if it bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States, or of any district or county attorney, or officer corresponding thereto, of any State or Territory, that he has examined the facts and in his opinion the complaint is well founded, the commission is hereby required to entertain and investigate the same. In all other cases the commission shall decide whether or not the petition ought to be proceeded with. The commission may, if they think fit, before requiring or permitting any formal proceedings to be taken on any petition, communicate the same to the railroad company against whom it is made, so as to afford them an opportunity of making such observations or taking such action thereon as they may think fit. The commission shall have power, and in a proper case is required, to cause a copy of the petition to be served upon the railroad company complained against, and to issue a notice requiring such company to appear before the commission and answer the said petition. The answer shall be in writing. After the answer is filed it shall then be lawful for the commission, if it shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper, all such inquiries into matters of fact as may be deemed necessary to enable the commission to form a just conclusion in respect of the matters of said petition. All the proceedings before said commission shall be directed by and under general orders, which shall secure to all persons interested reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence adduced before it, or by the report of any person to whom the commission may have referred the inquiry, or any part thereof, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in contravention or violation of this act by any railroad company or person so upon due and proper notice proceeded against, it shall be the duty of such commission to make and record its report in writing in respect of any such contravention or violation of this act, which report shall comprise and embrace the findings of the commission upon and in respect of all questions of fact in issue or involved in such proceedings, which report and findings shall in all subsequent proceedings be regarded as prima facie true. Within a reasonable time, not to exceed twenty days, after such report and findings are made by the commission, it shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon or delivered to the railroad company so found to have violated this act, to which shall be appended a notice to be issued by said commission to such company forthwith to cease and desist from such violation, and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which the act complained of occurred another copy of such report, findings, and notice.

SEC. 11. That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true, but shall presume such report to be true until the contrary is made to appear; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction, requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act. Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard, by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested. Such court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding. In any case where the court shall adjudge that the violation of this act by any company has been willful, or continued after notice to desist therefrom, the court may award to any party injured such a gross sum by way of costs as will reimburse all his costs, charges, expenses, counsel fees, and disbursements, to be paid by such company.

SEC. 12. That the commission may make, and from time to time amend, such general orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including all forms for proceeding, notices and the service thereof, and for the prescribing, directing, or regulating any matters authorized by this act. All the proceedings before said commission shall be upon reasonable notice to all parties interested, and such forms shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear and be heard in person or by attorney.

SEC. 13. That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned, have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, and in all subsequent proceedings their findings shall be taken as prima facie true, and shall also have the powers following:

(a) They may, by subpœna or order to be served by a person by them authorized, require the attendance of witnesses, and of all such persons as they think fit to call before them, or before any person by them authorized to prosecute an inquiry.

(b) They may require the production of all books, papers, and documents relating to any matter before them, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States.

(c) Either of them may administer oaths and affirmations.

SEC. 14. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general sessions shall be held and its records and archives be deposited. Whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, or one of the persons named in the ninth section hereof, or by any person specially appointed by the commission, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact, and may specially delegate to the officer or person conducting such inquiry such powers to that end as are by this act conferred upon the commission and may be deemed necessary. Every vote and official act of either of the commissioners shall be entered of record. The commission may conduct its proceeding in such a manner as will most conduce to the dispatch of business and to justice; they may sit together or separately, and either in private or public, but any proceeding before them shall be public upon the request of either party thereto; and a majority of said commission may determine any question submitted. The commission shall prescribe a railroad year, and a system of reports covering said year to be rendered by railroad companies; examine the books and accounts of said companies at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to said companies are enforced; furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads, in regard to the tariffs of fares and freight, or the accounts of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient; make an annual report of their doings to Congress on or before the 1st day of January of each year; and otherwise endeavor to procure the data necessary to the gradual enactment of an intelligent system of national legislation regulating interstate railroad commerce.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall provide suitable offices and a room for the public sessions of the commission in the city of Washington. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees as witnesses in the Federal courts, and depositions de bene esse and under commission may be taken to be used before the commission in the same manner and upon the same conditions as in such courts. The salaries and expenses of the commission shall be provided for, audited, and paid in the same manner as the salaries of judges and other judicial expenses.

SEC. 16. That said board of commissioners shall inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and state the result of their inquiry in their first annual report, and whether, in their judgment, any, and if so what, legislation is expedient in relation thereto.

SEC. 17. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, storage, or handling of property wholly within one State or Territory and not destined for continuous carriage beyond such State or Territory, or to property carried for the United States, or to the transportation of persons or articles free or at reduced rates for State or municipal governments or for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat.

SEC. 18. That in the construction of this act the phrases "railroad corporation" and "railroad company" shall be held to be synonymous, and to signify a corporation which either owns or operates a railroad as aforesaid, and shall include receivers, lessees, and trustees operating railroads, and all persons named in the first section of this act. The word "person" in this act includes plurality of persons, corporate and incorporate, and all persons in any manner engaged in interstate railway commerce in whatever capacity, whether as principals, agents, or employés.

SEC. 19. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the uses and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1885, and the intervening time anterior thereto.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] inquires whether my motion to print embraces his amendment. I am not sure whether it would do so, but I ask that the gentleman's amendment may be included.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, having been read and being now pending, will of course appear in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings.

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow me to understand the effect of the order in regard to my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is also pending.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. 7871) to remove the political disabilities of W. H. Ward, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, also reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. 7872) to remove the political disabilities of Gabriel H. Hill, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order of business was withdrawn, as was stated at the time, merely to permit gentlemen to introduce bills and joint resolutions for reference.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope I will be permitted to put these two bills removing political disabilities upon their passage at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think any one will object to passing bills removing political disabilities.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am on the floor asking to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

BRIDGET MORRIS.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7873) granting a pension to Bridget Morris; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK S. STRANG.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now hear the privileged report from the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the following resolution with the recommendation that it be put upon its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that Frederick S. Strang, late a cadet at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, has died in consequence of cruelties practiced upon him by senior cadets,

Resolved, That the Secretary of Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House any information he may have obtained in relation to the cause of death of the said Cadet Frederick S. Strang.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, to print in the RECORD a statement from the Committee on Naval Affairs on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the statement referred to?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have requested me to present this resolution. It relates to the allegation that Cadet Strang was hazed to death. It is a matter that could not be passed over when brought to the attention of the committee Those interested have said that they could get no response from the authorities who were interested in making an exposé of the matter; hence, through very reputable German friends interested in Cadet Strang, we were led to present the resolution as preliminary to more serious investigation should the matter require it.

It is not necessary to reproach Superintendent Ramsey or the authorities at the academy, though there is no doubt that hazing has existed in many types—some mild, some harsh, and some simply diabolical—at Annapolis, in spite of all denials to the contrary.

Damaging rumors, if not evidence, come that there is more or less of insubordination connected with the education at Annapolis. Rebellious demonstrations have disturbed the academy, and have threatened almost to culminate in revolt. The exasperating tricks and the mischievous demonstrations, with which the papers have been rife, indicate that some reform is necessary. One newspaper, the Hartford Courant, through its correspondent has referred to detailed reports concerning outrages at this national school. It says they show that a "great many young ruffians are getting their food and clothing from the public and giving promise of very slight return for the outlay." It gives this specimen of the doings of the young men:

Soon after the arrival of the "plebes" the august third-class man ascertains who are the pious young men. There are always pious young men at the first part of the academic course, but there are very few on graduation day. When the pious ones are found out, a religious service is held. With the pious ones for ministers and deacons, there is a meeting. It consists of preaching and prayer. Once every minute each one of the audience is required to give vent to hearty "amens."

But the immediate matter of this resolution concerns a young man whose home was in and whose appointment was from Oregon. I have letters before me which he addressed to his mother, and other evidences, showing the relation which he bore to the academy. I have letters in my possession from those whose sons have been at the institution, and who rejoice that they have escaped its contamination. If these are credible we need not wonder that some of these scenes are simply horrible. Boys are sent from the influence of a pure home-life to battle with sin and vice in all its forms of hideousness at this academy, dedicated by our law and money to the best education possible. If such be the character of this school, it would be best if it were broken up.

The death of young Strang occurred in October, 1883. It is said to have been the effect of "horse-play," so called, on the part of the third class. Whatever this "horse-play" is, it is certain that within twelve hours after Strang went to the academy he was in the hospital. His injuries are alleged as the result of falling out of his hammock. It is further alleged that a surgical operation was necessary, and the boy died from the effects. But his friends believe that he was fatally hurt in an encounter with the third class, by being put in a barrel and rolled around until "the hazing party" chose to let him out.

Other instances of hazing have been brought to my attention. It is a violation of the oath taken on entering the academy. The cadet is required by oath to support all laws; and hazing is a violation of law. Still this hazing goes on. In my judgment, any man of ordinary skill and discipline might stop it; but I do not know. Some one should know and that soon. If this resolution is answered by the Secretary of the Navy, and it reveals a condition calling for general investigation, our committee will ask for it, for the honor and humanity of the service.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish also to make a statement on this subject to go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, this resolution should be adopted. The circumstances attending the appointment and death of young Strang were peculiar. I had the honor of naming him as a cadet at Annapolis. I was particularly impressed with his native energy and qualifications for the position. Practically left an orphan, his success over the many obstacles in his way demonstrated that he was possessed of those traits and characteristics that guaranteed success in the future. He was subjected in Oregon to a most searching examination, both mentally and physically, and it can well be imagined with what surprise and pain I heard of his sad and untimely death. He lived, I believe, but a few hours after his admission. Rumors were current in the press and otherwise that he met his death through hazing. If this be true we should know it, and should take such steps as will not only punish crime committed but prevent its repetition.

I know not whether there is any foundation for these rumors, but justice to the deceased, to his friends and relatives, to ourselves and to our country, and to that honored institution the Naval Academy itself, demand that the full light of investigation be turned upon the unfortunate event. I concur in the adoption of the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain Indians.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, the House Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7872) to remove the political disabilities of Gabriel H. Hill, of Virginia, and the bill (H. R. 7871) to remove the political disabilities of W. H. Ward, of Virginia, and the same were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 737) to remove the political disabilities of J. R. Waddy was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

LOUISA LE G. JEFFORDS.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1337) granting increase of pension to Louisa Le G. Jeffords, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage.

I desire to say that a bill of like tenor was reported from the Committee on Pensions of the last session and was passed by the House. Another of like tenor was passed by the Senate. I hope under the circumstances there will be no objection to taking up this Senate bill and putting it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the gentleman from Iowa proposes to discharge that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the committee reported?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We have an evening session every Friday night for the consideration of such bills, and I hope as the bill has not been reported back from the committee the gentleman will not press his motion.

Mr. STRUBLE. I understand this bill could not be considered on Friday evening under the order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SURVIVORS OF STEAMER JEANNETTE.

On motion of Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent leave was granted for the withdrawal of the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs on Senate bill 1039, for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette, and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas.

On motion of Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent the bill (S. 1039) for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. REAGAN (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 8, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 7872) to remove the political disabilities of Gabriel H. Hill, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 7871) to remove the political disabilities of W. H. Ward, of Virginia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 737) to remove the political disabilities of J. R. Waddy, of Virginia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of John C. Myers, of Reading, Pa., praying reimbursement for certain moneys expended and services rendered by him in the investigation of the conduct of George F. Seward, late consul-general, and Oliver B. Bradford, late deputy consul-general, at Shanghai, China; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I present certain papers, and among them a petition of Jennette S. Kent, relating to the bill (S. 2384) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent, and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a memorial of Cigar-makers' Union, No. 223, of Amenia, N. Y., and a memorial of Cigar-makers' Union, No. 9, of Troy, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of the American Ornithologists' Union, praying the establishment of a bureau of ornithology as a branch of the Agricultural Department; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Millbridge, Me., praying for the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1374) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site, and the construction of suitable buildings thereon, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar, and at the proper time I shall ask its consideration by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2458) for the relief of David L. Brainard and others, non-commissioned officers and privates of the Greely expedition, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

THE BARGE PIRATE.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York, to report it without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. What is the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to grant and issue to the lighter or barge Pirate, now lying at New York, an American register or enrollment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. From what committee does it come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Commerce, reported by the Senator from New York.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It is a House bill; it has passed the House.

Mr. HALE. What are the circumstances?

Mr. CONGER. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. Is there any report accompanying it?

Mr. CONGER. No; but there is a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury recommending it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I can briefly explain it, and I think there will be no possible objection to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York, if there be no objection, will be allowed to explain the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The facts are simply these: The barge named in the bill was built in Boston in 1854 as an American vessel. Some years after it was sold under a mortgage foreclosure and came into the possession of a citizen of Hayti under the Haytian flag. It was then engaged in foreign commerce, and upon coming into the port of Norfolk in the United States some time ago it was there condemned as a wreck, having had a very stormy passage and being very much damaged. It was bought by a citizen of the United States and by him taken to New Jersey with the intention of repairing it as a sea-going vessel; but upon examination it was found to be so badly wrecked that that was abandoned, and it was subsequently rebuilt and made into a barge without any motive power, simply to be towed. It can be used in no other service save that of our internal waters. The American citizen before rebuilding it took legal counsel, which counsel advised him that upon so rebuilding it there would be no difficulty in obtaining an American register. After the money had been expended, some $3,500, when the papers were applied for the application was refused upon the ground that some of the material in the barge came from the old Haytian vessel, which was originally one of American build. It is impossible that this American citizen should get any return whatever for his money unless he be allowed an American register, for the vessel now, instead of being a sea-going vessel, is simply a barge to be towed about in the internal waters.

Mr. HALE. The Senator believes that the case comes under the spirit of the general law allowing an American register to be given to wrecked vessels that have been rebuilt, but not technically?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. There is no doubt but that it comes under the spirit of that law. The measure is simply asked for as a matter of equity. If it came absolutely under the law technically, of course the Secretary of the Treasury would have granted the papers; but it is one of those cases where the repairs are not equal to three-quarters of the value of the wreck, and therefore the papers can not be granted. This citizen acted in good faith, after having taken counsel; he has his money invested in it; and it is simply to put it in internal trade, because it is no longer a sea-going vessel. The Secretary of the Treasury has examined the case and reported favorably upon it, and it is necessary that the bill should be passed in order that the vessel may be used.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF SCHWATKA'S REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the official report of Lieut. Frederick Schwatka of his military reconnaissance on the Yukon River, in Alaska, to which considerable public attention was directed. The committee instruct me to report a concurrent resolution for printing the same, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the official report of Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, of his military reconnaissance be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use the War Department.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Secretary of War and the Lieutenant-General strongly recommend the printing of the report. I believe it is a matter of considerable public interest and value.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2507) to amend the law concerning mechanics' liens in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2508) to regulate the letting of mail contracts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 2509) to confirm titles to lands in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2510) for the relief of the Good Intent and other companies; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 2512) touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2513) to amend the law in relation to the registration of trade-marks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

FEES IN PENSION CASES.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 2511) relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be read the second time at length, Mr. President.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 2. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant; and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fees for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 3. That the fee in all pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases; and such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or presumptive claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 5. That any agent or attorney or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive and retain any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

SEC. 6. That no agent or attorney shall either demand or receive, on account of the prosecution of any claim provided for under the provisions of this act, where such claim was filed after the 28th day of June, 1878, and prior to the 4th day of July, 1884, any fee or sum of money in excess of $10; nor shall said $10, or any part thereof, be paid to any agent or attorney until he make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in section 4 of this act; and if it shall appear from said affidavit, or in any other way, that all or any part of said $10 has been paid, it shall be deducted therefrom, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such attorney as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with any contracts, entered into fairly and without fraud or duress, for the prosecution of claims filed after the 4th day of July, 1884, and prior to the passage of this act; and that any person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be, upon conviction, punished as provided in the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall not be so construed as to prohibit any claimant the prosecution of whose claim has been heretofore abandoned by his attorney from employing another attorney or agent, but in no such case shall the fee paid such attorney exceed the sum of $10, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act: Provided, That if such new attorney successfully prosecute such claim, that the original attorney or agent shall not be allowed to demand or receive any part thereof, under the penalties of the sixth section of this act.

SEC. 8. That hereafter no person or persons who may have been heretofore engaged in the prosecution of pension or bounty-land claims of any character whatsoever, and who may have heretofore collected on account thereof any sum whatever, shall be allowed to sell, assign, convey, or make over to any other person any such claim or claims, so as that it shall be lawful for any vendee or assignee of such claim or claims to demand or receive any other or greater fee than is hereinbefore provided for; nor shall such vendee or assignee be allowed to receive anything therefor until the vendor or assignor of such claim or claims, if alive, shall make and file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavit provided for in the fourth section of this act; and any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties imposed by the sixth section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act authorizing contracts for a fee of $25 shall be limited to attorneys or agents residing in the State where the claimant resides, and shall not extend to agents or attorneys in the District of Columbia; and it shall be unlawful for any agent or attorney residing in a State of which the claimant is resident to enter into partnership with or otherwise to divide the fee of $25 with any attorney or agent residing in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 9. That all of the provisions of the act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1884, relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases, are hereby repealed: Provided, That as to offenses committed under said act all the provisions thereof shall remain in full force.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I offer the bill this morning and ask its reference to the Committee on Pensions, for the reason that I desire to have the expression of that committee with regard to this proposed legislation. I do not wish to be held responsible for all the provisions of the bill. All the provisions of it are found in House bill 7785, being the pension appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. It is legislation the object of which is to regulate the fees of attorneys and agents in pension cases, and to repeal the legislation upon that subject which was passed last year on the pension appropriation bill for the current year.

I desire this reference for two purposes: In the first place, that the Committee on Appropriations of this body, when the pension appropriation bill for next year comes up for its consideration, will not be confronted with the fact that the attention of the Senate has not been called to this important legislation; and in the next place, the legislation which is proposed to be repealed by the last section of the bill which I have introduced is the legislation of last year put upon the pension appropriation bill in a conference committee.

It will be remembered that when the pension appropriation bill was before the Senate last year it came to us with a large amount of legislation relating to this subject and to other subjects. Under the rules of this body it is impossible for the Senate Committee on Appropriations or for the Senate itself to consider legislation on an appropriation bill. Therefore, under the rulings of the Chair and under the practice of the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations on that very bill were instructed to report it back without any legislation whatever; and the committee, under the instructions of the Senate, so reported the bill; so that when the bill passed the Senate at the last session there was no legislation upon it as amended by the Senate. It then went to the House and, the House refusing to agree to our amendment striking out the legislation, a committee of conference was ordered upon the bill, and several sections relating to the question of compensation to pension attorneys were put upon the bill and agreed to. Now, there is great complaint that that was hasty legislation and legislation unjust to the soldiers of the country, and it has been stated in some quarters indirectly, although not directly, that the Senate of the United States is responsible for this legislation.

The object of the bill which I have introduced is, in some respects, if there was hasty and inconsiderate and unjust legislation on the pension appropriation bill last year, that that legislation may be corrected.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator state what the points are that are alleged to be unjust?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not so familiar, perhaps, with the acts relating to pension practice as I ought to be, and if I misstate them I hope the chairman of the Committee on Pensions or some other member of that committee will correct me. Under the act of 1870, or at any rate prior to 1878, the law was that no attorney should receive compensation for his services until after the pension had been allowed. By the legislation of 1878 that limitation was removed and pension attorneys were authorized to receive a portion at least of the compensation during the pendency of the claim, and the compensation was limited to $10. The Committee on Pensions in this body reported an elaborate bill at the last session of Congress looking to a re-establishment of the law of 1870, together with sundry and divers limitations for the regulation of the practice of attorneys before the Pension Bureau. When the pension appropriation bill came to the Senate it had upon it legislation looking in the same direction, and the Committee on Pensions, in the discussion that was had upon the bill, called attention to the fact that they had prepared an elaborate and well-considered measure on the subject; and I believe the chairman of the committee called attention to the fact that if legislation was had, in lieu of the legislation proposed by the House on the appropriation bill, that contained in the Pension Committee's bill should be adopted by the Senate. But under the rules of the Senate it was impossible for us to consider that bill at all on the appropriation bill; and therefore it was that the Committee on Pensions could not in this body, under our rules, propose, as an amendment to the legislation proffered by the House, anything in regard to this question of compensation.

Mr. INGALLS. Because it was legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Because it was legislation on an appropriation bill, and therefore prohibited by the rules of the Senate. That bill restored the law of 1870, as I understand, and provided that in cases where a written agreement was filed in the Pension Office a fee of $25 might be charged by the attorney prosecuting a claim; but it also provided, as I remember, that where pension applications were made after the law of 1878 and before the passage of that proposed law, in no case should a fee beyond $10 be allowed.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will permit me, I think the provision of the last law was that a fee not exceeding $25, to be determined by the Commissioner, might be allowed.

Mr. ALLISON. That is as the conference committee reported the measure to the Senate and as it was finally passed. That provision in the bill of the Pensions Committee of the Senate, for some reason or other, I do not know how, does not appear in the bill reported from the committee of conference, and therefore the Pension Bureau has ruled, as I understand, that the pension attorneys can go back to 1878, and that upon all claims filed between 1878 and 1884 they can present a written agreement and receive a compensation of $25 in lieu of $10 as provided by the law of 1878. Thus it is claimed that these attorneys or agents in pension cases have oppressed and are oppressing the pension claimants who filed their claims between 1878 and 1884, covering, of course, all the cases of arrearages of pensions. Whether that is the correct construction of the law of last year, I do not pretend to say. It certainly is within the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions to say whether the fee shall be $25 or $15, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Now, it is claimed that that was vicious legislation put upon an appropriation bill without due consideration; and to correct that vicious legislation it is claimed that these sections, nine in number, ought to be adopted this year on the pension appropriation bill, for the purpose of correcting legislation vicious in its character passed upon the pension appropriation bill last year.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under our rules it is impossible for us on appropriation bills to have well-considered legislation, because we can not offer amendments nor can we debate the questions that may come up with relation to legislative provisions on an appropriation bill.

I have presented this bill, taking it bodily from the appropriation bill which Senators will find upon their tables this morning, and I ask the especial attention and consideration of the Committee on Pensions to this proposed legislation, so that they may report to us (and I think the report should be as speedily made as the committee can find convenience to make it with the other matters they have before them), and that the Senate may know whether the legislation of last year was well considered or proper legislation; and, if it is not, that the Committee on Pensions, the proper committee of this body, acting under our rules, shall so inform us and present to us a bill upon this important subject, as it relates to all the pension claimants in this country. That is the object I have in introducing the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator permit an interruption just there?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. I desire to inquire in what respect the bill he has just offered differs from the bill which was reported on behalf of the Pension Committee at the last session on that very subject?

Mr. ALLISON. It differs materially in many respects, so far as I am able to judge from having given it, of course, a somewhat hasty examination. All the features of detail which are involved in the bill reported by the Senator from Tennessee are omitted in this bill, and the legislation on the appropriation bill of last year is absolutely repealed so far as the detailed provisions are concerned.

What I desire, and what I think the Committee on Appropriations are entitled to have, is the judgment of the Committee on Pensions reported to the Senate in the form of a bill, their attention being called to the legislation of last year on an appropriation bill. Let that committee report to us such a bill, an independent measure, because under our rules we can not consider this measure on an appropriation bill. Let them report an independent measure so that we may send it to the House of Representatives and have their independent and separate judgment upon it.

I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, while all that the Senator from Iowa has said meets my approval in regard to his desire to relieve the Committee on Appropriations from great difficulties, it does not reach the root of the evil, because every other appropriation bill that comes from the House may contain legislation of the same character which the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate will be wholly unable to touch. Last year in the sundry civil bill we had a law regulating the fees of marshals and affecting the connection of the Government with the great Pacific and other railroads, among other things that were apparently and I suppose actually very imperfect, and which the House itself would have desired to amend. We could not touch any of them. There is not an appropriation bill that comes from the House of Representatives that may not have, as it did have last year (and at this short session it will be worse even than it was at the long session of last year), just such legislation, which we are obliged to reject or obliged to accept as it comes from the House; and when we reach a committee of conference we are obliged to agree to it or, if the Senate conferees refuse to strike it out, the bill is lost altogether. That is the way much legislation comes in.

We can only reach the object in view by the Joint Committee on Rules establishing some rule binding upon both Houses if they can, or, if they can not, reporting to us that they can not, and then we must take our stand upon the question of legislation on appropriation bills firmly and decidedly, let the consequences be what they may.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will state that the Senate Committee on Rules at the beginning of the last session of this Congress reported a set of joint rules which have been before, and I suppose are being considered by, the House Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules of the Senate, I simply desire to say, reported such rules as would effectually remedy this evil if the House would agree to the rules so reported or rules similar in effect. The Committee on Rules of the Senate have done all that it was in their power to do.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee, who knows very much more about the rules than I do, and has been quite observant in regard to the difficulties we have had on appropriation bills, if some joint rule is not absolutely necessary to protect the Committee on Appropriations in acting upon appropriation bills with legislation in them?

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky and other Senators that a joint rule that will protect appropriation bills from general legislation is very important to the Committee on Appropriations, as it is to the country, in my opinion. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that the only remedy in my judgment that the Senate has, in the absence of such joint rule, is that the Senate strike out, without regard to merit, every feature that is general legislation which comes to us in an appropriation bill from the House. There is a remedy in that, and so far as I am concerned I am ready not only to vote to strike out every such provision without regard to merit, but to stand upon the striking out to the last extremity.

Mr. BECK. The purpose I have in view is being attained quite rapidly by declarations of that sort. Then we are confronted with the fact that whatever the House of Representatives under its rules may put in an appropriation bill, even if it is stricken out by the Senate, only sends it to a committee of conference where it can hold us or reject the bill altogether. Then is the Senate prepared to refuse to pass appropriation bills into which the House under its rules can insert legislation that we can not amend? We go one step further, and when that step is reached an issue is made upon which the country will have to decide who is right and who is wrong.

All I rose to say is, that while the bill of the Senator from Iowa meets my approval, we shall in all probability be confronted with legislation on appropriation bills at this short session of Congress of only about fifty working days. I alluded to the sundry civil bill of last year, and the Senator from Iowa knows the trouble we had about it in regard to railroads and marshals and many other things that were very important. My real object is to impress upon the Joint Committee on Rules the importance of making a very earnest and serious effort, so as to avoid what this is only the beginning of in the pension appropriation bill and which may be followed in every other appropriation bill with things of the same sort. Our committee may appeal to them, attention having been called to it by the Senator from Iowa. If the Committee on Rules would make an earnest effort, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] being very well able to explain our difficulties, they may succeed before many important bills come up in having some agreement that may save both Houses a great deal of trouble.

Mr. DAWES. I was a member of the committee of conference to which the differences of the two Houses upon the pension appropriation bill were committed at the last session, and signed the conference report. I regret that the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], is not present, as he had the matter especially in charge and could explain the considerations which led the committee to recommend the concurrence of the Senate in the report. It was a question of compromise. The committee on the part of the Senate were with the Senate in the proposition to make proper appropriations for the pension department of the Government and nothing more in an appropriation bill. They were met, however, by a bill which not only made those appropriations, but had in it very essential modifications of the existing law, and the conferees were in controversy for a long time between making these appropriations and adopting the proposed legislation. The legislation which came ultimately into that appropriation bill was put there in order to save the bill. It was a modification or substitute for the legislation which came to this body in the bill, better the committee thought than the proposition which came here, but so far as I am concerned and (I speak with some confidence) so far as the other members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate were concerned, unsatisfactory to them. It was in their opinion the best they could do. Under the rules of the Senate, the Senate was forbidden even to amend or modify that legislation. Their alternative was to take it exactly as it came from the House, or to reject it altogether. They rejected it. The House refused to pass the appropriation bill without that legislation.

The committee of conference was then brought at the very last moment to say that they would take this provision. I thought I foresaw the condition of things which is now represented to exist. A provision that all contracts heretofore made under the $10 limitation could be remodeled between the claim agent and the applicant within the limitation of $25, subject to the supervision of the Commissioner of Pensions, would certainly result in my opinion (although I had no opportunity to make that statement to the Senate when the conference report was adopted; it was adopted without debate and without opportunity of debate) in circulars sent out from here to all applicants insisting upon a new contract within the limitation of $25 and the Commissioner of Pensions would practically approve of them all; it would be impossible for him to review them. I understand that a corps of clerks is now set apart to review and investigate the amount of labor in each claim that is finally adjudicated to see whether $25 is or is not a reasonable sum.

Every applicant has this circular sent to him informing him in substance that the law has been modified and that he must sign a new contract, and he signs that contract believing that he is obliged to pay the $25; and under the law the Commissioner is obliged to look into the matter, and see whether $25 is a reasonable sum. It results practically in every applicant whose claim has not been adjudicated being obliged to pay $25 instead of $10.

But, sir, I do not see how the Senator from Iowa is going to reach this difficulty in the method which he proposes. He will get the opinion of the Committee on Pensions; he may get the opinion of the Senate; but when the pension appropriation bill comes up, here under our rules we can not amend that bill by modifying it according to the conclusions of our Committee on Pensions or of the Senate itself. We must reject altogether the legislation which is in that bill, and take the appropriations simply just as we did last year, and then be confronted in a committee of conference precisely as we were last year with the alternative, "take this legislation along with the appropriations, or not get the appropriations," with the additional pressure that will be on us that the session ends on the 4th of March.

Mr. President, the evil lies where the Senator from Kentucky has indicated it. Unless the two Houses can come to some common understanding about the form and shape of their appropriation bills we shall be constantly and always in the power of a committee of conference, or be faced with the alternative of taking such legislation in appropriation bills as may be brought here for us to consider. We have no deliberation upon the subject. This evil of legislation in appropriation bills has been growing upon Congress for these many years. When I first had anything to do with appropriation bills they were upon the objection of a single member stripped by an iron rule, in the body of which I was then a member, from everything that looked to independent legislation; and so careful were the members of that rule and so impressed were they with the importance of it that care was taken at the moment every appropriation bill was reported, before it went to a Committee of the Whole for consideration, to raise the objection, so that no omission of time might give any legislation, which peradventure might have crept into the bill unaware, exemption from the objection of any member. Now almost the entire legislation of Congress has found its way into appropriation bills, and the Senate has voluntarily tied its own hands. Knowing that under some rules legislation of any kind and however broad can come here in appropriation bills and under the pressure of the power and necessity of appropriations, we have voluntarily tied our hands and said that we will not permit ourselves to introduce any independent legislation which is right and absolutely necessary, and further that we will not even modify by any amendment such legislation as shall come to us. I can not conceive of anything so absurd, to say nothing of the evil tendencies of such a course of legislation and of such rules.

Now, Mr. President, what does the Senator from Iowa gain if he gets a report from the Committee on Pensions of a modified and well-considered and proper plan that shall meet unanimously the judgment of the Senate? He can not offer it as a modification of the existing law. All he can do and all that is possible is that a committee of conference can take that in their pocket into the conference room, and they can tender it to the conferees they meet there; but the conferees they meet there can do as they please with the 4th of March staring us in the face.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, in answer for a moment to what the Senator from Massachusetts suggests as to the practical remedy, I will say that I do not know that anything can be accomplished, but certainly if here is vicious legislation, as is claimed, I take it for granted the House of Representatives will be swift to correct that legislation, especially when we send to them the means of doing so in the form of an independent bill. I can not for an instant suppose that legislation of this importance will be smothered under the two hundred bills said to be lying somewhere that have already passed this body. Therefore it is that I am endeavoring, knowing that we have put gyves upon our wrists in reference to our legislation, to see if I can not in some way untie our hands by means of an independent measure which is now said to be of pressing and immediate importance. Hence I have introduced this bill in the hope that we can send to the House of Representatives separate and independent legislation for their action, and thus relieve us under the rules from the embarrassment in which we are placed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, hardly anything could have come up that would show more clearly than the present situation the infirmity under which the Senate labors in resisting legislation upon appropriation bills. The Senate for some years has been making an earnest and consistent and steady fight against what it believes is a vicious practice in legislation—that is, incorporating upon appropriation bills important general legislation. The ground taken by the Senate has been that by that practice there is no opportunity for consideration; and appropriation bills dealing with the numerous items of expenditure needed by the different Departments of the Government come in almost always late in the session, and do not furnish a proper vehicle for the discussion of important legislative matters. So the Senate has endeavored to maintain its attitude upon appropriation bills, and if it were able to maintain this attitude and to so influence the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, its purpose would be accomplished. But all the same, notwithstanding the fight that the Senate has made, every year important legislative provisions are incorporated in appropriation bills and become a part of the general law of the land, and are a portion of the general legislation of Congress.

Why is this? Because the Senate is always at a disadvantage; and the present situation, as I have said, illustrates it more completely than anything I have seen in my service in this body. An appropriation bill comes to the Senate with a half-dozen provisions of general legislation which the other House has put upon it and sent to the Senate. The Senate refers the bill to the Committee on Appropriations and under the rules of the Senate and under the spirit of the rules the Committee on Appropriations strikes out all the legislative provisions from the bill and reports a clean and simple proposition for appropriations, as it did last year in the case of the pension bill. All that is very well so far as the Senate is concerned. The bill passes the Senate shorn of the objectionable features and goes back to the House, and the House, as it has a clear right under its rules to do, disagrees to the Senate's amendments and appoints a committee of conference. The bill is returned to the Senate, and the Senate appoints a committee of conference to meet the conferees of the House, and the whole matter is thrown into the conference, which is the deliberation of six men, three Senators and three Representatives. The outcome is that sometimes the Senate conferees are obliged either to abandon their ground in toto and consent to the House legislation, or exercising their best discretion to accept portions of or to modify the House legislation; and the result is that, under the whip and spur of a conference report passed on the appropriation bills almost always in the last three days of the session, the legislation goes through. We are here confronted precisely with that situation; and when I read the proceeding that took place in the House of Representatives as they appear in the RECORD I find that although all the legislation upon the pension appropriation bill which is now objected to was initiated in the other branch, still the Senate does not escape responsibility.

I was about to ask the Secretary to read from the RECORD of yesterday morning; but, on reflection, I will not ask to have anything read from the debates in the House, because some Senator might call attention to the point of order which would exclude it. But it is impossible to realize the serious condition that the Senate finds itself now confronting without taking into consideration the attitude and the debates of the two Houses. I will only then, without referring to anything that has taken place elsewhere, suppose this case: An appropriation bill comes from the House of Representatives loaded with legislation. The Senate strikes it off. It goes back to the House clean—an appropriation bill pure and simple. The House insists upon its legislation. The whole subject is thrown into conference, and out of that conference comes a bill with legislation upon it that a year's observation and a year's experience show to be very vicious, very pernicious legislation, and the Senate has not escaped the responsibility because it may be said by the House of Representatives in maintaining its ground that unless the particular items of legislation, just as they appear in the final law as it is enacted, were incorporated into the provisions of the House bill the House is not responsible for it; and so the responsibility may be thrown upon this body. So then, although the Senate is striving to prevent legislation upon appropriation bills and the House is insisting upon putting legislation upon them, if as an outcome of a conference vicious legislation is found to result because the House has insisted on putting legislation upon an appropriation bill, if it is not found in the law in precisely the terms of the House proposition, then the responsibility is shifted upon the Senate, and we are liable to find ourselves in that situation upon every appropriation bill.

I must say, Mr. President, that for one I am becoming somewhat weakened in my view as to our position under the present system of rules that we are doing legislation by; I am becoming somewhat doubtful about the wisdom of our rule with reference to legislation. We are all the time at the mercy of the House. We can not amend their legislation; we can put on no new legislation; we are thrown into conference, and they have the advantage of us. There is only one remedy, and that is the one suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. If the Senate as a body in all cases, no matter what the legislation is, will declare, and stand firmly to the declaration, that it will have nothing to do with general legislation upon appropriation bills, and will refuse to accept the reports of conferees whenever a particle of general legislation has been found to creep into those reports, then a monition would be served upon the co-ordinate branch that might be of some avail; but until that has been done we are at the mercy of the other branch.

I do not know whether the general rules applicable to both bodies, the rules referred to by the Senator from Tennessee as reported by our Committee on Rules, can be carried any further. But unless the House assents to give up its superior privilege and to adopt a joint rule that shall apply in common to both of the bodies, we are liable all the time to be found in the present condition.

The Senator from Iowa very properly proposes to take the provisions of legislation that are found now upon an appropriation bill, to refer them to the Committee on Pensions, and to ask that committee to report a bill containing them and send it to the House; but in the condition of the docket of the House that will not be acted on, and the House can do all the time what we can not do. It is not obliged to resort to the channels of the various committees that deal with the different subjects-matter of legislation as we are, but may wait until the waning days of the session and put legislation on an appropriation bill and send it here and we are confronted with it.

It seems to me that it is high time that something was done, either that a joint rule be made or that we let up on the stringency of our rule, which is constantly disabling us and putting us at the mercy of the other House.

Mr. BECK. I wish to submit to the Senator from Maine that the difficulty we have now, and the reason I suggested a modification of the rule was this: Even if the bill of the Senator from Iowa passes, it will necessarily go on the Calendar of the House, and there a single man can prevent it from ever being taken up; and I understand that there are two hundred Senate bills now before the House that have not yet even been referred. So we must either have a joint rule agreed to by both Houses or the present rule so modified that we can amend House provisions on appropriation bills to avoid trouble.

Mr. HALE. I had these difficulties in mind when I referred to the improbability of any action being taken by the other body on a bill reported by the Committee on Pensions and passed in this body. It is almost impossible for any new legislation sent over by us now to that body to be got through, from the difficulties that the Senator has referred to and others very numerous.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to those Senators who have roared so loud and thundered in the index about the impropriety of legislation upon general appropriation bills; and I admired the vigor with which the Senator from Tennessee with resounding clamor smote his desk and declared that for one he was willing to stand up in solid phalanx and declare that the aggressions of the House of Representatives should be resisted, if necessary, to the death. That amusing comedy has been repeated in my hearing over and over again interum interumque for the past five years. We have resolved that there should be no legislation on general appropriation bills. We have declared that the system was vicious, that it had been increased from year to year until finally it had come to pass that almost the entire mass of legislation was vested in the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses, and we have withdrawn ourselves and gone up into a high mountain and declared that for us and our people we would have nothing to do with that sort of legislation.

The Senator from Maine advised us in the observations which he has just closed, and to which I listened with so much pleasure, about the dangers of the situation and the fact that we were at the mercy of the House of Representatives. How are we at the mercy of the House of Representatives? "By tying our own hands," soto voce says the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. We are at the mercy of the House of Representatives not by reason of any infirmity in the powers of the Senate, but by reason of the infirmity of the Committee on Appropriations of this body. "Tied our hands," again says the Senator from Missouri. Tied our hands! Why, sir, again and again, whenever this subject has been brought to the attention of the Senate upon a yea-and-nay vote, there never has been a single Senator recording his vote against any concessions to the House of Representatives—never one. There never has been a division of opinion as to what the powers of the Senate were and that our rules were correct and should be observed.

Mr. President, there being a definite and final disagreement between the two Houses, the whole subject goes into committee of conference and that committee of conference is composed of members of the Committees on Appropriations in the two Houses. The committee of conference on the part of the House confronts the members of the committee on the part of the Senate and says to them, "We intend to insist on our rights; we insist upon these amendments whether you call them legislation or not upon appropriation bills." Have not the conferees on the part of the Senate the same right to say to the conferees on the part of the House, "We insist upon the rules of our body that legislation shall not be upon appropriation bills?" But what is the result? After baffling about, after diplomacy, after discussion and debate until time is wasted and perhaps the hour of adjournment has been fixed, in comes the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate and says, "We were compelled to yield to the conferees on the part of the House; time was getting valuable, the hour of adjournment was near; it might be that appropriation would altogether fail, that we should have no money for the support of the Army, that there would be none to pay for the Navy, and therefore we thought best, under all the circumstances, to yield to the demand of the conferees on the part of the House, and we now submit our report including legislation upon general appropriation bills!"

I submit, sir, that so far as the action of the Senate upon this subject has been concerned, ever since this has been incorporated on our rules, we have been deliberately abandoned in every instance by the Committee on Appropriations. After having been admonished by the Senate by a vote that was unanimous, without a dissenting voice, Republican or Democrat, that we insisted upon our rule and that we did not propose to yield to the aggressions on the part of the House of Representatives, in every single instance the Committee on Appropriations have come in and said that they were compelled to yield to the members of the House of Representatives for fear appropriations might fail. Suppose appropriations did fail, under the circumstances would there be any more responsibility, if our rule is right, if we are a co-ordinate branch, if we have the same power that the House of Representatives have, would there be any more responsibility resting on the Senate than there would be on the House of Representatives? I never have heard in the House of Representatives that the chairman of a committee of conference came in and said that the conferees on the part of the Senate refused to yield. That is a statement which never has echoed under the panels and through the corridors of that end of the Capitol. It would be refreshing, it would be a novelty, it would be charming indeed if sometimes we could hear the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, or the chairman of a conference committee there say, "The Senate conferees refused to yield to us; we were compelled to abandon our position. Although we believed we were right, we were obliged to relinquish the ground on which we stood." But no! It is commonly supposed that each of these bodies is of equal dignity; but never within my experience, never during the twelve years that I have been honored with a seat in this body, have I heard it said in the House of Representatives, "The conferees on the part of the Senate compelled us to abandon our position and yield to their demand, although we thought they were wrong."

Mr. President, I believe that legislation upon appropriation bills is vicious. I think with the Senators who have spoken upon this subject that the practice has enormously increased until, as has been said, the power has been practically lodged in the Committees on Appropriations in both branches of Congress. We all know how the pressure is brought to bear; we all know the power of delay, of procrastination, until we are caught in the very jaws of expiring time. But, sir, we are, so far as I know, the sole illustration of a deliberative body that has voluntarily cast itself into a dungeon and loaded itself with chains and left its adversary free.

The Senator from Maine says let us have a joint committee on rules that will deal with this subject. We do not need a joint committee on rules. The Senator knows that the House of Representatives will not consent to a committee on rules that shall compel them to relinquish their prerogative.

Mr. HALE. My suggestion was not for a joint committee, but a joint rule such as the Senator from Tennessee has referred to.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, that there shall be no legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. That there shall be a common rule upon this most important subject-matter applicable to both Houses, that the measure of restriction of legislation upon appropriation bills shall be the same there as here. I am beginning to believe, I state plainly to the Senator, that we never shall reach what I think is desirable without some provision of that kind.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, nobody knows better than the Senator from Maine, I presume, that so long as the House of Representatives have notice served on them by the Committee on Appropriations from session to session that they can do exactly as they please in this matter, they will not relinquish that power.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him here?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. It is a very easy thing, as the Senator knows, for one to claim that another body or that another person shall have more backbone. It is a very easy thing to charge that the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate gives away the rights of this body; but let me tell the Senator that the Senate at any time is liable to find itself confronted on an appropriation bill with legislation that is in itself so strictly just, that has so much inherent merit, that the Senate itself will not stand against it. Here, in the very case now in question, the House of Representatives has put upon an appropriation bill provisions that cure serious defects, which apply to the vast mass of pensioners throughout the country. It is removing a grievance that hundreds of thousands of men are interested in, whose complaints come to our doors and speak in such tones that neither the Senator nor I will disregard them; and when upon the annual appropriation bill for pensions there is found a provision that cures the legislation of last year in the interest of pensioners, and the House of Representatives insist that it shall pass upon an appropriation bill, and that situation confronts the Senate in the last days of the session, the Senate will yield, and will allow that legislation to go on, and the Committee on Appropriations will not stand in the way of the Senate, and if it did it would be voted down. And unless the Senator from Kansas has himself changed his views and the propositions of legislation that he has enforced for the soldier, he will be the first man who will run from the position the Senate has assumed. The Committee on Appropriations is all the time confronted with this situation, and it is impossible, even by taking an attitude such as has been taken here by the Senator from Tennessee, to remedy this evil, because the Senate, not in any cowardly way, but realizing that it is confronted with legislation that may be sound and good, will yield. It will make the best fight it can, but under the present conditions it can not make an effective fight.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations have never invited on any single occasion an expression of opinion as to the merits or demerits of the legislation to which they have consented in committee of conference. It does not do for the Senator from Maine to assume that I shall be a fugitive from the position that I have occupied until he has invited me to say whether I will run or whether I will stay. Whenever the Committee on Appropriations have invited an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate upon this proposition, as I said before, there has never been a vote against adhering to the rules of this body that there should be no legislation upon appropriation bills.

The Senator from Maine now says that we are brought into this emergency, that upon certain occasions there is legislation confessedly so just that the Senate of its own motion, by its own volition, recedes from its position and adopts the proposition made by the House. That condition of affairs has never been presented to this body; never once; but the Senate has declared affirmatively that it will adhere to its rules, that there shall be no departure from them. The conferees on the part of the Senate come in and make a report that has been signed by the conferees on the part of the House, and that has been signed by the conferees on the part of the Senate, which concludes their action so far as it is possible, and then ask the Senate to say yea or nay upon that proposition.

Mr. HALE. Now let me ask the Senator there this question: When a conference committee of three on the part of the Senate has made its report and has recommended yielding to the House upon certain features of legislation, after perhaps it has stripped the bill of a great many others, will the Senator tell me why his responsibility then as a Senator is not just as great as mine? Where is the difference in the attitude of any member of this body? If he desires to reject a conference report because it has recommended yielding to the House on matters of legislation, why does not the Senator from Kansas, when the report is made, at once antagonize it and make a contest over it here in the Senate? I should like to see him do it. The responsibility of the committee of conference ceases the moment it makes its report and presents it to the Senate, and after that every Senator who lets that report pass without having made the issue and brought the Senate to an attitude upon it, shares equally in the responsibility.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Maine says that he never has heard me object to this method of procedure. If he has not heard it, it is because he has been absent giving the Senate away on other propositions, for there have been repeated occasions—not one but many occasions—when I have risen here and called the attention of the Senate to the absurdity of the proposition that after we had expressed our opinion upon these matters a committee of conference should come in here and say that they were compelled to yield to the House of Representatives, and that we must take that or take nothing.

Mr. HALE. What has been the result of the Senator's effort in that direction?

Mr. INGALLS. Nothing.

Mr. HALE. The Senate then has sustained repeatedly, whenever the issue has been raised, the committee in yielding; and that bears out the point I have made that from time to time the Senate will be found ready to yield.

Mr. INGALLS. I recall one or two instances upon a subject that may be of interest to the Senator from Maine. I think he is or has been acting as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate. He has been greatly interested in the project of building up and rehabilitating the American Navy. At the last session of Congress the Senate adopted certain amendments to the naval appropriation bill that I believe went to the House of Representatives and were disagreed to there. I recollect that matter also went into conference, and the Senate resolved, I believe without a single dissenting voice, to adhere to the amendments that we had made to the naval appropriation bill. If I recollect aright, even in that matter the Senate abandoned its own amendments, of which the Senator from Maine, I think, was the responsible author, was more than any other Senator responsible for, and we passed what is known as an emergency appropriation bill for the period of six months. When we assembled here in December the Senator from Maine, resolved to insist upon the prerogatives of the Senate, declaring that we would for once try the strength of our mettle with the House of Representatives, refused to agree to another emergency appropriation bill, called up the old committee of conference, and had another committee appointed. The House refused to agree to the amendments proposed by the Senate; they sent over here another emergency appropriation bill covering the period of thirty-one days, and so strenuous was the Senator from Maine as to the strength of his position that he made up his mind that rather than abandon the attitude the Senate had taken upon the proposition they would absolutely refuse to adjourn over the holiday recess, and we spent two or three days here in wrangling and discussing and debating whether we would adjourn on the 22d or the 24th of December. I believe, after some discussion upon that important subject, after endeavoring to bring a pressure to bear upon the House of Representatives by refusing to adjourn for the holidays, discretion was finally concluded to be the better part of valor, even in that case, and on the 22d or 23d of December the adjournment resolution passed, and the amendments of the Senate were definitely abandoned so far as that was concerned.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; they were not abandoned. The Senator was not here at that time, and therefore he has got the record wrong. The Senate insisted upon its attitude and before adjournment had amended the last House bill by a definite appropriation for the last six months of the present fiscal year based upon the estimates for the present year, thereby maintaining its attitude. It never agreed to adjourn until it had done that and sent that action to the House of Representatives, and the Senate upon that matter stands to-day having taken its position that it will not agree to any appropriation that is not made in detail upon the estimates of the present year, upon the needs of the present year; and I hope it will maintain that attitude no matter what happens.

I only rose to correct the Senator, because the Senate did not in any way yield its position with reference to the naval appropriation bill, having sent over the third bill to the House before adjournment.

Mr. INGALLS. Did not the committee absolutely abandon all provisions for the construction of the Navy that were added to the first bill that the House sent over here?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, because that was not the great point in controversy this year. The Senate very well understands, and the Senator does, that upon appropriations for money for specific objects neither House can coerce the other—that is, the House originating special specific objects can not stand if the other House is in opposition. That is not the controversy, and never has been on the naval appropriation bill this year. It was at the last session, but has not been this.

Mr. INGALLS. Did not the Committee on Appropriations recommend the adoption of the bill at the early part of this session as it passed the Senate at the last session?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; that is exactly what I said. The whole position taken by the Senate on this proposition has been abandoned at this session; and now we stand upon a simple matter of definition as to whether there shall be an appropriation in lump or whether we shall untangle and disravel and dishevel it and put it out dollar by dollar and cent by cent.

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator that that is a matter of very little importance. It is a matter of the greatest importance that appropriation bills should be considered with reference to the estimates in detail, with every object specified in the bill, and any other course and any other policy leads to permanent appropriations, which for years both Senate and House have been trying to abolish and do away with.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have no desire to continue this discussion longer. It is apparent from what has been said and from the general course of legislation for the past five years that we have adopted a position that we can not maintain. Certainly if that statement requires modification, it is true that we have adopted a position that we do not maintain.

There are just two ways out of the difficulty: either we must have a Committee on Appropriations that will not yield in committees of conference to any demands made on the part of the House of Representatives, or we must strike out the first clause of the third section of Rule XVI. That is the simple proposition before us. And I submit, after what has appeared this morning with regard to the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa, that nothing could be more futile, nothing could be more trivial, nothing could be more unlikely to accomplish the object that he seeks to attain, than the consideration of the bill he has introduced by the Committee on Pensions of this body. The House have sent it over here as a part of their appropriation bill. How does it change our rules if the Committee on Pensions say that is good legislation? I wish the Senator from Iowa would be more explicit. If there is any method by which the affirmative action of the Committee on Pensions can relieve us of this difficulty, I shall be glad to concur with his proposition; but if there is not, I submit to him that he is darkening counsel by words without wisdom when he attempts to convince us that we can get around this dilemma by having the Committee on Pensions consider the bill that he has offered this morning.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think I ought as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to thank my friend from Kansas for the compliment he pays that committee, because, if what he says be true, it is a committee that is able to lead at its will and pleasure the seventy-six Senators on this floor, whether it be a triumphal march with the Senator from Kansas at the tail of the procession or whether it be one of humiliation toward the House of Representatives with the Senator from Kansas occupying the same position.

Mr. President, it is no easy task for the Committee on Appropriations to handle these questions, and I have said this over and over again in this body with reference to the position of the House of Representatives and with reference to the situation under our own rules; and I must beg to remind the Senator from Kansas that while he is engaged in other avocations at the close of the session of the Senate, either at the short session or the long, while he may be packing his trunk for the journey to Kansas at the close of his labors here, the Committee on Appropriations is diligent in its efforts to reach the difficulties pending with regard to the great questions concerning appropriations that must always be settled before we can have a final adjournment. The Senator must remember, as we all do know, that in these matters of appropriation where there is difference between the two Houses whether it respects the amount of the appropriations, or whether it respects regulations and rules with regard to their expenditure, or whether it respects legislation that is forced on the appropriation bills by the House of Representatives, after all, the Congress of the United States is composed of two bodies, the House of Representatives and the Senate; and when we have differences, no matter what they are, those differences must in some way be composed, because the Government of the United States must go on, and it can not go on without appropriations of public moneys.

I want to remind the Senator of another fact. He says that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate on every occasion yields and surrenders to the House, that on no occasion within his knowledge has the Committee on Appropriations insisted upon its propositions with reference to matters of legislation and triumphed over the House, but that always the House of Representatives comes out triumphant in the end. Why, Mr. President, I need not tell the Senator that at the very last session of Congress most important matters of legislation were put upon the legislative appropriation bill and most important matters upon the sundry civil bill, both bills being required to be passed before the 1st day of July because the appropriations ceased on that day with reference to the great matters appropriated for in the sundry civil bill and in the legislative bill, and that finally the House of Representatives surrendered in toto and absolutely the important legislation that it had put on those bills, in deference to the Senate Committee on Appropriations if you please to designate it in that way, or in deference to the will and judgment of the Senate.

Look at the question of the compensation of marshals, regarded by the House of Representatives as a most important matter. Your Committee on Appropriations brought in here four disagreements upon that bill, standing by the rule which the Senator from Kansas says ought to be adhered to. Standing by the rule of the Senate in regard to legislation, four times upon that bill we stood here and finally the House did yield. It yielded also important legislation on the legislative and judicial appropriation bill; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] reminds me there was very important legislation upon that bill with reference to distilled spirits in bond. There were other important matters which I do not now call to mind but which occupied the conference committees by the hour, not during the light of the sun, but away into the gray hours of the early morning, endeavoring to secure an agreement.

Is it true that your Committee on Appropriations is so imbecile; is it true that its members know so little of the rules and regard so little the judgment of the Senate that they come in here, in violation of its rules and in violation of its will, and enforce upon the Senate reluctantly that which it does not agree to? The very accusation of the Senator from Kansas condemns himself. He is not without ability to discuss these questions; he is not too modest to discuss them when he desires to do so; but I have yet to know or hear of an instance where the Senator from Kansas has come and said to a conference committee, "You have yielded a principle to the House of Representatives which we insist upon." He says he has now and then and here and there expressed his opinion on this subject. Doubtless he has; but like every other Senator here, when we are confronted with a day of adjournment fixed by the House of Representatives and also yielded to by the Senate, then he sees that the appropriation bills must pass or an extra session must come. Take the bills of last year; I think I am permitted to say that those bills, important in their character, although that was a long session of Congress, running from the 3d day of December to the 7th day of July, were not received by your Committee on Appropriations until five or six months of the session had passed, until not only the House of Representatives had wended its way homeward with scarcely any of its membership left, but the Senate also was left with a bare quorum; and yet we were confronted with these important matters and had to settle them before we adjourned.

It will not do for the Senator from Kansas to say that the remedy is for us to stay here perpetually and forever. The Committee on Appropriations and the conference committees composed of members of that committee are as willing to remain here as any other Senators on this floor. We have resisted this legislation not only up to the mark of the judgment of the Senate and its persistency, but we have gone even beyond it, and Senators have discussed publicly on the floor, and have gone privately to the committee and discussed these questions with reference to the time of adjournment.

The Senator from Kansas says that this is a trivial matter that I have introduced here this morning; that my remedy is not a proper remedy. If it be true, as stated elsewhere, that there was vicious legislation put upon the pension appropriation bill last year, then that legislation should be corrected before we adjourn. I ask the Senator from Kansas—I need not ask him because he knows perfectly well that that legislation can not be corrected under our rules on an appropriation bill. Now it is the duty of the Senate in some way to correct that vicious legislation, if it be vicious. I have resorted to the only method whereby it can be done. I have introduced the bill and proposed to refer it to the appropriate committee of this body to consider it, and we are not required to say that that is futile because another body will not consider it. When we have passed that bill in this body and sent it to the co-ordinate branch, our duty in reference to it is ended. It may be that we shall be confronted with a remedy which the Senator from Kansas did not mention, namely, that the Committee on Appropriations and the Senate following them will be obliged to allow this Congress to expire on the 3d day of March without any appropriation being made for the payment of pensions to the soldiers of the country, or else we shall be confronted with the other alternative that we shall have a called session of the Forty-ninth Congress.
